Last night's program: Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13; Mendelssohn, concerto in E minor for violin, with orchestra, Op. 64, Richard Burgin, soloist; Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," (after the old-fashioned roguish manner, in rondo form), Op. 28; Saint-Saens, Symphony, with organ, in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78. Albert Snow at the organ. It was a program cumulative in interest and instructiveness. The Goldmark masterpiece, by now fairly familiar, served chiefly to warm the players to the more difficult work at hand, for the Mendelssohn concerto is in many ways as exacting of ensemble as of soloist. Mr. Burgin played with rare fervor and brilliancy; to the second movement, andante, he gave beauty of tone and color worthy of Kreisler himself. He was recalled five times at the end of his fine performance.

Then, it was as if Mr. Monteux said to his audience, "Now, my children, I am going to give you something appetizing, something that tastes nice, and then I am going to give you something which may not seem so palatable but which yet will be good for you." And he proceeded to unfold the "once upon a time" legend of Eulenspiegel, in all the richness and novelty of the Strauss inventiveness, until all were in abundant good humor. Then, with unwonted impressiveness, imparted to every player before him, he gave such a reading of the mighty Saint-Saens symphony, through to the thunderous finale, as to rouse even the most turgid soul. It was a justification of his choice of this number for the climax of this so-called "popular" series. It was music in its highest, most absolute form. For those who heard it, and still were unmoved, there will come soon the lighter things, the summer trifles proffered by the Pops.

HERALD-APR 11.

The Boston Orchestra's Extra Series of Concerts Ended

The fifth and last of the "extra" series of Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Sakuntala"........Goldmark
Concerto for violin...........Mendelssohn
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss
Symphony No. 3 in C Minor..Saint-Saëns

The programs of this series of symphony concerts have in no wise deviated from the usual standard maintained at the Friday and Saturday concerts but in arranging them Mr. Monteux has evidently borne in mind that his public on these Monday evenings would perhaps be likely to consist of persons less regular in their attendance upon concerts of symphonic music than that frequenting the long established Friday and Saturday gatherings. His good taste in his choice of the pieces has been commendable, for he has avoided the hackneyed and commonplace as well as those novel experiments in musical composition of certain disquieting moderns which undoubtedly have a right to be heard but which would be out of keeping with the general purpose for which these concerts of Monday were instituted. In this way he has succeeded in giving the programs a character all their own, quite as delightful and interesting as those which he makes for other occasions, yet distinctly different. In their performance too, he has often brought to the playing of long familiar pieces a freshness and animation none the less remarkable, so that a listener, no matter how familiar he may be with such music, is always able to derive pleasure and profit from the hearing of it. This is no mean attainment on Mr. Monteux's part for the task must have been no light one. The continuation of this new series next year may, therefore, be looked forward to with anticipation for it has added a distinctly characteristic note to the past musical season.

Last evening the outstanding feature of the program was Saint-Saëns' Symphony. Familiar as it is, each rehearing reveals new beauties, new perfections of form and constructive skill. It was played with an unusually sympathetic understanding and sense of proportion. Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist in Mendelssohn's concerto, grateful to both soloist and listener. He has never played here with greater authority of style or perfection of technic, and he succeeded in giving an interpretation of this thrice familiar work which was free from sentimentality, yet which was musically convincing. Strauss' tone poem and Goldmark's Overture were brilliantly played. The orchestra and its conductor cannot be accused of not understanding German music. The playing of the tone poem was as filled with the spirit of German folk music as was that of the Saint-Saëns' Symphony with Gallic grace and clarity.

A new Symphony by Mr. Converse, his second, to be played for the first times anywhere, and fragments from Wagner's operas will divide the programme for the Symphony concerts of next week. The Wagnerian excerpts are the music of the Venusberg from "Tannhäuser," the music of the forest from "Siegfried," and the "Ascent to Brünnhilde's Fire-Girt Rock, the Dawn and The Rhine-Journey" as arranged by Richter from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung." To them Mr. Monteux, of his motion and for larger end, has appended the final pages of the latter music-drama.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon arranged a program that the audience found very interesting through the contrast that was offered. The arrangement was: The Haydn symphony in D major; the Schumann "Manfred" music; the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," Wagner; and the Strauss "Don Quixote" theme and variations. Surely, greater contrast than that between the Haydn and the Strauss numbers could not be imagined.

There was no soloist except, that in the Manfred number, Louis Speyer played exquisitely a solo on the English horn, and he was applauded to the echo, which by the way, was appropriate since the solo was of the pastoral type with echoes throughout.

In the "Don Quixote," the burden of the music was carried successfully by Jean Bedetti, cellist, and Georges Fourel, who had the viola solos. Their work was difficult and very beautifully done.

The program, considered as a whole, was one of the best that has been given lately, and the audience gave Conductor Monteux every indication of its admiration for him and his men. He finally called the entire orchestra to their feet to respond to the plaudits.

The Haydn symphony was delightful throughout the four movements. There are not many conductors today who give the nice consideration for every little beauty that is in the Haydn that Mr. Monteux does. It is and should be appreciated by his hearers.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the last pair but one of the regular series of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will take place. Pierre Monteux will on this occasion give the first public performance of the latest symphony of Frederick S. Converse, the celebrated New England composer. The latter portion of the program will consist of the following excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner: "The Bacchanale," from "Tannhauser"; "Forest Murmurs" from Siegfried; "The Ascent of Brunnhilde's Rock" from Siegfried's "Daybreak"; and Siegfried's "Rhine Journey," from the "Dusk of the Gods."

Symphony Plays Parsifal Music

To give a religious tone to this week's Symphony concerts, Pierre Monteux is conducting the Good Friday Spell music from Wagner's sacred music drama, "Parsifal." The most brilliant feature of yesterday's matinee was "Don Quixote," one of the most graphic and entertaining of the Richard Strauss tone poems. Haydn's melodious D major symphony and the romantic, colorful music that Schumann wrote to accompany Byron's "Manfred" are the other numbers on the program.

THE "POPS"

On the night of May 1 the last vestige of the "high-brow" season of concerts in Symphony Hall having finished, the delightful Spring relaxation of the "Pop" concerts will take possession and extend every night, except Sunday, through the Spring and into the early Summer. This, the thirty-seventh season of the historical "Pops," which are so very much Boston's own institution, promises with a splendid array of Pop nights to be one of the most gloriously successful of them all. Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Pops for five seasons past and surely the most popular leader that the Pops have ever had, will again be at the helm.

SYMPHONY ENNOBLES STRAUSS

Telling Performance of Tone Poem, "Don Quixote"

BY OLIN DOWNES

Had it been said, even 50 years ago, that the music of the future would present, among other things, orchestral compositions in which solo instruments would take the place of personages in drama; that these instruments would play a kind of music as free, as irregular in its rhythms, as intelligible and varied in its meanings as speech; that an instrument would address the audience with an individuality as striking as that of any great actor who might appear on the stage, and wring the heart—had such things been said, there would have been only incredulity and amusement to echo the statements.

IN "DON QUIXOTE"

There are still those incredulous and amused at the idea of music doing anything like that, just as people were amused when Balzac in the '30's or '40's wrote his story of "Gambetta, the Mad Musician." But exactly these things have been accomplished by Richard Strauss in his tone-poem, "Don Quixote," played yesterday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, in Symphony Hall. An admirable performance of a most impressive work.

As it sounded yesterday, a quarter of a century since the first blazing manifestations of Strauss's genius stirred the world, there was not a weak spot in the whole work. It is a tour de force, both of inspiration and workmanship. It is the immediate and thoughtless thing to poke fun at the variations which imitate the bleating of sheep or the whirring of wind. These things were intended by the composer to be laughed at. They are details of a picture; they throw into the higher relief the absurd, noble, tragic figure of the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance.

Strauss Supremely Human

In those variations which treat of this Ideal, of the argument with Panza on chivalry, of the sleep of Panza while the Don invokes the vision of his beloved, and above all the unforgettable pathos of the concluding pages, Strauss is supremely pitiful, unforgettably human. He is human, too, if sardonic and merciless in his picturing of the bourgeois, fat-witted Sancho.

Here is indeed a rare pair, limned by the instruments as distinctly as if they were together on the stage. These solo instruments, these characters, as it were, were taken by Mr. Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, as Don Quixote; by Georges Fourel, violinist, as Sancho Panza, in which connection the tenor tuba also deserves special mention, for Sancho is at times sounds like a viola, at other times like a tenor tuba and even a bass clarinet!

Mr. Bedetti's Virtuosity

Of all the performances of the 'cello part given in Boston Mr. Bedetti's seemed to us the most eloquent. He had noble music of laughter, and gentleness, and tears. It will be long before his interpretation of the final pages of the composition, in which Don Quixote, in all humbleness and prayer, gives up the ghost, will be forgotten. Mr. Fourel, too, gave an excellent performance. The orchestra distinguished itself.

The other compositions were the good natured symphony of Haydn in D major, briskly played; excerpts— the "Entracte," "Ranz des Vaches," and "Invocation"—from the charming but rather weak music which Schumann wrote for Byron's "Manfred"—music which is Schumann, and not Byron at all, and in honor of the season, the wonderful music of the "Good Friday Spell," from Wagner's "Parsifal." This was one of Mr. Monteux's most notable concerts.

Strauss and the Spanish Don at at Boston Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-[illegible] yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was:

Three [illegible] the music to Byron's "Manfred" ......Schumann

It is too late in the day to discourse of the genius of Richard Strauss. That has long since been admitted by all, although some still make the admission with reservations. Yet the impression created by yesterday's performance of his "Don Quixote" was none the less novel and vivid than on its first hearing many years ago. It is possible that its long absence from Boston programs may have served to heighten its effect at this time, but none the less it is a work which grows with the years and which will reveal more and more of its beauty as time goes on. Taken by themselves, many portions of the composition are no doubt harsh and strident, but in their proper setting they are seen to be necessary to the effect of the work as a whole, and in a composition planned on so large a scale the passages of mere filling in are few and far between. No composer of modern times, save Strauss, could have successfully indulged in such flights of fancy, such bold and daring realism, and only the imaginative power and orchestral skill of a Berlioz could have equaled him among those of the past in the musical portrayal of such a fantastic hero as the Spanish Don.

Each and every variation is a marvel of the just expression of the underlying poetic idea, yet the music never descends to mere caricature but

A Farewell Symphony

By Deems Taylor

THE orchestra season in New York is over. The New York Symphony and Boston Orchestras are through, the Philharmonic has completed its regular series and has only two performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony to play, and the Philadelphia Orchestra gives its farewell concert of the year on Tuesday evening. In another week or two New York, which has had as many as three symphonic concerts in a day, will have none at all until the Stadium Concerts begin next July. Meanwhile, a brief valedictory upon this year's orchestral activities might possess a certain fascination for those who have an eye for statistics.

For the purposes of this discussion we will stick to Manhattan Island, as that is the field beyond which few of the reviewers ever stray in their concert going. On Manhattan Island, then, during the season of 1921-22, there were given 167 orchestral concerts. This figure includes the two coming Beethoven performances of the Philharmonic and excludes the free concerts given at the Metropolitan Museum of Art and other places. These were given by the following organizations: By the Philharmonic Orchestra, under Josef Stransky, Willem Mengelberg, Artur Bodanzky and Henry Hadley, seventy-five; by the New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch and Albert Coates, fifty; by the Society of the Friends of Music, under Artur Bodanzky, ten; by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Leopold Stokowski, ten; by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteaux, ten. In addition to these regular subscription series Richard Strauss conducted the Philharmonic and Philadelphia Orchestras in ten concerts; the Cleveland Orchestra, under Nikolai Sokoloff, gave one, and the Harvard University Orchestra gave one. Pablo Casals conducted the New York Symphony Orchestra in one concrt, Willem Van Hoogstraten conducted the Philharmonic in two and at one concert five conductors in turn conducted a mammoth orchestra assembled from the forces of the New York Symphony, the Philadelphia and the Philharmonic. The World reviewer heard sixty-six of these concerts, and is still fond of orchestral music.

THERE were no new orchestras formed this year and, so far as this chronicler knows, none are planned. One of last year's, the National Symphony, died and went to heaven—or at least was absorbed by the Philharmonic, together with its two conductors, Willem Mengelberg and Artur Bodanzky. This gave the Philharmonic almost as many leaders as a South American army, and made it necessary for the management to book an extra series of Tuesday evening concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House in order to find work for so many hands. Mr. Stransky and Mr. Hadley divided the first half of the season between them—the exact proportion was Stransky, thirty-five concerts; Hadley, one—with Mr. Bodanzky and Mr. Mengelberg sharing the concerts from Jan. 31 on.

The New York Symphony got along with two conductors—Mr. Damrosch, the regular, and Mr. Coates, the guest—the same as last season; while the Philadelphia and Boston bands contented themselves with Mr. Stokowsky and Mr. Monteux respectively.

ANY attempt to rank the orchestras that have been heard here this season can be, of course, only a purely personal selection, and must be taken as such. I should place the Philadelphia Orchestra first for all-round excellence as an agency for the purveying of symphonic music. It has several superlative players, notably William Kincaid, the first flute; Michel Penha, the first cellist; Thaddeus Rich, the concertmaster, and Ernest Williams, the first trumpet; and, more than that, it possesses a beauty and homogeneity of tone, a perfection of discipline, and a certain exhilarating buayancy and flexibility in its playing that make it a delight to the ear. It is a wonderful instrument, and to one listener, at least, the finest he has heard.

I should place the New York Symphony Orchestra second. It, too, has its quota of star players, headed by Georges Barrere, the first flute, and as a body possesses possibly the finest tone quality of all. Its violin section is about flawless. It lacks, however, the perfection in ensemble possessed by the Philadelphia organization.

THE Boston Orchestra is a close third. It retains some of its great players—Georges Longy, the first oboe, remains supreme in his class—but has some of the marvellous tonal balance and technical precision that it used to possess. The Philharmonic ranks fourth, but not discreditably so. It is a huge organization (103 men), nearly half of whose personnel have been with it only a year. Consequenty it is still in a state of flux. Its first-desk men incude some of the best players in the country—for example, Scipione Guidi, the concertmaster; Gustav Langenus, the first clarinet, and Xaver Reiter, the first horn—and it has improved notably in tone balance and precision of attack during the season.

The Orchestra of the Society of the Friends of Music can hardly be assayed as a regular symphony organization, as its members are recruited from the personnel of the Metropolitan Opera House Orchestra. The Metropolitan Sunday night concerts, by the way, are not included in the number of symphonic concerts given during the season.

NEW YORK heard thirteen different conductors during the season—nine regulars and four new ones. The greatest of all, considered solely as an orchestral leader, is undoubtedly Willem Mengelberg, the Dutch guest conductor of the Philharmonic. He has an almost uncanny power to make orchestra players give more than they have, and his performances reached a degree of technical finish, subtle tone-blending and emotional power that set them quite apart. The other regulars—Bodanzky, Coates, Damrosch, Hadley, Monteux, Sokoloff, Stokowski, Stransky—remained much as we had known them before. Mr. Coates hardly repeated the profound impression he made the season before, when Mr. Damrosch first introduced him to New York audiences. The British conductor has undoubted energy and fire, and plays certain British and Russian works superbly, but a longer acquaintance with his powers revealed his tendency to push orchestral sonority clear across the borderline of noise, and to take much of his music at a breakneck speed that blurred everything. Mr. Stokowski also lets his orchestra wax a bit overemphatic occasionally, but he seldom indulges in sheer noise.

Richard Strauss appeared as a conductor after a lapse of so many years that he may be considered as a newcomer. He achieved brilliant results with the Philadelphia Orchestra, some of which were due to Mr. Stokowski's preliminary rehearsals of the Strauss works. Vincent D'Indy conducted two concerts of the New York Symphony Orchestra—his first appearance since 1905—with no very earth-shaking results. The best of the newcomers were Willem Van Hoogstraten, Elly Ney's husband, who conducted the Philharmonic Orchestra in two excellent concerts at Carnegie Hall, and Pablo Casals, the famous cellist, who conducted the New York Symphony Orchestra a week or so ago, revealing himself as a conductor of great gifts. Mr. Van Hoogstraten, by the way, is to share with Henry Hadley the responsibility of conducting the Stadium Concerts this summer.

PERHAPS the most interesting concert of the year was that given for the benefit of the American Academy at Rome, where the New York Symphony, Philharmonic and Philadelphia Orchestras joined forces and played under five consecutive conductors—Stransky, Bodanzky, Mengelberg, Coates and Stokowski. The huge body of players, thanks to some careful rehearsing, played with wonderful unanimity, quite unlike the usual instrumental scrambling of such impromptu organizations.

TO a reviewer Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Damrosch are the most helpful conductors. Both excel as programme makers. There was hardly a concert given by each of them that did not present a novelty, an interesting soloist, a striking revival, or some other feature calculated to give one something to write about. Mr. Monteux is another good programme maker, catholic in his tastes, with an exceptional ear for interesting new music. Mr. Mengelberg is the least helpful, with Mr. Bodanzky a close second. Both stuck pretty closely to the German classics, rarely becoming more contemporaneous than Wagner or Chaikovsky. They play great music, it is true, but they provide little opportunity for extended discussion. It is difficult to think of anything astonishing to say about the Pastoral symphony.

THE orchestras played thirty-six new compositions this season. Geographically, they ranked as follows: American, 8; British, 8; German (including Austrian), 7; French, 6; Dutch, 3; Russian, Finnish, Spanish, Italian, Polish, 1 each. They were distributed among the orchestras as follows: Philharmonic—American, 5; Dutch, 3; Finnish, French, Austrian, 1 each. New York Symphony—British, 6; French, 4; American, 1. Boston—German, Spanish, Polish, American, 1 each. Philadelphia—German, 2; Italian and American, 1 each. Philharmonic (with Toronto Choir, under H. A. Fricker)—British, 1. Friends of Music—German, 3; French, 1; Russian, 1.

AGAIN, any attempt to appraise the merits of these new works can be based only upon the principle of "I know what I like." From that point of view, then, the outstanding new composition of the year is Karol Szymanowski's Symphony No. 2, in B-flat, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the evening of Feb. 3. In this opinion The World reviewer is probably as unsupported by his critical brethren as any one could be, but he can only maintain doggedly that to him the Szymanowski symphony was and remains a work of enormous technical skill, and surpassing beauty and eloquence, and that it moved him profoundly.

In second place goes Charles Martin Loeffler's orchestral setting for voice and orchestra of three Irish poems. This was also introduced by Mr. Monteux, on March 16, with John McCormack as the soloist. The music falls short of complete success in conveying the mysticism and Celtic melancholy of the poems, but it is beautiful music, exquisitely scored, and has vitality.

In third place should go Ravel's choreographic tone-poem, "La Valse," a work of moody and ironic beauty, which Mr. Mengelberg introduced on Feb. 17. Vaughan-Williams's Fantasy on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, played by the New York Symphony under Damrosch on March 9, ranks well with the Ravel work except for its undue length. If its composer would cut three or four minutes out of it there seems to be no good reason why it should not become a part of the regular orchestral repertoire.

OF the other novelties, the most interesting were De Falla's con dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat," played by th by the Symphony; Lord Berner's "Fantasy Espagnole," pl Skilton's New York Symphony; Gilbert's "Indian Sketches" enter's "A Pilgrim Vision," played by the Philadelphia Or a. ably survive chiefly in their influence upon more creatively gifted men. The "Give a Thought to Mahler" Society, of which Mr. Mengelberg and Mr. Bodanzky are ardent charter members, did its best for the Viennese master. Mr. Bodanzky had the Friends of Music perform his "Das Lied Von Der Erde" twice, while Mr. Mengelberg played his third symphony five consecutive times. Nothing happened.

THERE was a certain amount of propaganda, of course. Mr. Coates played no novelties other than of British extraction, Mr. D'Indy conducted three new French works, including his own, and even Mr. Mengelberg, the moment he got a few spare rehearsals, yielded to temptation and produced three works by contemporary Dutch composers. None of these was worth a second hearing. Two or three were not worth a first. It is illuminating to notice that the most interesting and exciting music of the year was introduced by two conductors who had neither a favorite composer to boost nor a nationalistic axe to grind, Mr. Monteux and Mr. Stokowski. The former played the year's two best novelties, while the latter gave us a chance to hear some of the most violently discussed music of the present day. The best test of new music remains, as it always has been, not "Who wrote it?" but "Is it any good?"

MR. STRANSKY was the only conductor to introduce many American works. He played three. Mr. Hadley, Mr. Damrosch, Mr. Mengelberg and Mr. Stokowski played one apiece. This scanty showing might be more discouraging to America if it were not for the fact that the activities of Mengelberg, Coates and D'Indy rather demonstrated that Holland, Great Britain and France are doing no better. There were certain American works that should have been played, of course—and weren't—but there is another season coming. Perhaps next year, now that Dopper's "Gothic Chaconne" and Van Goudoever's cello suite and Schrecker's "Prelude to a Drama" are out of the way, we shall have a chance to hear again Carpenter's "Perambulator" suite and Charles Griffes's "The Pleasure Dome of Khubla Khan" and "The White Peacock."

ways sympathetic; and in the conclusion it strikes a note of real pathos. Mr. Monteux gave the work with true understanding of its character. To some it may seem remarkable that a Frenchman can interpret a distinctively German work with so complete a comprehension of its spirit. To others who have followed his career since he became the leader of this orchestra it is only another added proof of his interpretative capabilities in the music of all schools. Mr. Bedetti played the solo violoncello part with his accustomed beauty of tone and felicity of expression. The playing of Mr. Fourel, the solo viola, was no less excellent.

Schumann's music to "Manfred" is one of his greatest works. It is only to be regretted that the three movements played yesterday were not the most interesting ones. Mr. Speyer played the all too short solo for the English horn with fine tone and phrasing. Placed somewhat too far behind the scenes, his echo effects could scarcely have been audible to those sitting in the rear of the hall.

The D major symphony of Haydn is one of his most perfect works in this form. Too often he is represented by his lighter, gayer, more trivial compositions. In this symphony, however, we find him in more serious mood. The introduction sounds a solemn note, rare with him, and the orchestration is fuller and more varied than usual. After all our modern improvements in orchestration, in form, in harmony, there is still much to be learned from this master, apparently simple as his music seems. Even Mozart in his symphonic works scarcely equaled him, and Beethoven, great as was the originality of his genius, owes much to this teacher and friend of his youth. Wagner, for once, seemed out of place. His "Good Friday Spell" is not one of his greatest inspirations, and in spite of the sceues with which it is associated in the opera, it often sounded theatrical and forced.

OLD AND MODERN ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Orchestra Proves Equally at Home in Each

Yesterday's Symphony concert began with a lively, well-balanced performance of Haydn's D major Symphony and ended with Strauss' "Don Quixote," eloquently played, proving the present orchestra equally at home in old and modern music, despite some doubts lately expressed on the subject. In between came curiously fragmentary excerpts from Schumann's incidental music to Byron's "Manfred," and, in honor of the day, the "Good Friday Spell," from Act 3 of Wagner's "Parsifal."

There was no formal soloist, but Mr Speyer in the "Ran des Vaches" from "Manfred," and Messrs Bedetti and Fourel in "Don Quixote" were deservedly named in the program for their important incidental solos. Their playing was far more musicianly than that of some of the official "soloists" has been.

"Don Quixote," never popular here, as some of its companion pieces have become, was coldly received, except by a few hundred enthusiasts, although the orchestra has seldom of late years done better work. The variations are not easily followed or referred back to the theme, and much of the music seems rather dull except as a direct and slavish following of Cervantes' story, which Strauss claims it is not. Yet there are many beautiful passages scattered through it, warmly, lyrically emotional in the vein of the composer's best songs.

Mr Monteaux has reversed Dr Muck's custom of never giving excerpts from pieces not composed for concert performance, in the main wisely. But sometimes the excerpts are not complete in themselves, like tantalizing snatches of tunes which one never hears finished. The "Good Friday Spell" yesterday is quite capable of standing alone, but not even the prop of Byron's text quoted at length in the programs saved the "Manfred" snatches from seeming pointless.

Haydn's D Major Symphony, the twelfth of those composed for the English impressario Salomon, is a very favorable specimen of his music, forthright, squaretoed, with its skeleton structure painfully emphasized to aid ears unused to the sonata form, yet full of homely energy and good spirits, with an occasional bit of serious, dignified eloquence added. It was both accurately and sympathetically played.

Next week a new Symphony in E major, by F. S. Converse of Boston, will be given its first public performance. The rest of the program is made up of excerpts from Wagner operas.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

STRAUSS'S "DON QUIXOTE" AFTER PRELUDINGS

Tone-Poem That Remains Masterpiece of Large Design and Unflagging Accomplishment, That Ranges from Grotesquerie to Pity and Ecstasy, That Is Tragi-Comedy Summed and Vivid in [illegible]—Haydn, Wagner, Mr. Speyer [illegible] Spring

[illegible] may be, as some like to say in Europe, that Strauss belongs to a generation in music past and unlikely to return. It may be, as some in America [illegible] this dictum, that the interest of au[illegible] in his symphonic pieces now be[illegible] ends [illegible] "Till [illegible] tion." Possibly the later and larger tone-poems are as monstrous and, in kind and degree, as mannered as detractors affirm them. Even Strauss himself, at fifty-eight, may be the figure whom recorders and commentators have already set in a museum-niche with the proper label above it and the suitable paragraph in the catalogue. Yet somehow, when he comes back to the concert-hall in his own person, as he did in the United States last autumn, a public neither volatile nor undiscriminating discovers him anew as an illustrious composer, an eminent conductor, a puissant personage still in the making and the playing of music. Within easy memory, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago flocked to the orchestral concerts in which he arrayed and—for many—clarified and repointed his tone-poems; while Boston would have done as much, had it not, through oversight rather than indifference, missed the opportunity.

As for the questioned pieces of the later years, "A Hero-Life" still assembles an audience from stage to door-posts, especially when Mr. Mengelberg clothes it also in his own eloquence; "Zarathustra" by no means passes unheard; while, yesterday at the Symphony Concert, "Don Quixote" overshadowed all else on the programme, put orchestra, conductor and audience to their mettle, held hearers intent through nearly forty minutes, won the applause of general and genuine pleasure. As it is, and possibly for not a few, Richard Strauss in these later tone-poems remains that irritating object—a corpse obstinately alive.

Contrary to the usual course in such impressions, the first response of many a hearer to "Don Quixote" is enjoyment and admiration of the mind. To characterize in music, whatever the subject-matter, has been a passion of composers from Berlioz and Liszt to Milhaud and Malipiero. In particular, such characterization of an individual figure out of poetry, picture, legend, tale, has possessed them. Project it musically upon the ears and the imagination of the audience; amplify, adorn it by like means; lead it tonally through adventures and fates, appointed or devised; write, if need or fancy prompt, prologue and epilogue. A favorite means to these ends has been the theme with variations, made ready by an introduction, rounded with a finale. So Strauss, unpretentiously, semi-conventionally, as it almost seems, has chosen to work in "Don Quixote."

An introduction prepares the way for the theme of Cervantes's knight, anticipates in degree the content and course of the tone-poem. The music sets forth that theme and makes the first violoncello insistent and imparting voice. A secondary theme stands beside it, of the "grousing" Sancho Panza for whom tuba or bass-clarinet or viola are appointed voices. Then ensue ten variations—of Quixote's adventures usually grotesque and ludicrous; of his night-vigil and rapt visioning by his arms; of his dreams and speech upon the glories of perfect knighthood. As his hallucinations have waxed in the introduction, so they wane at the end of the variations. The finale lays him on his death-bed, leads him back again to simplicity and serenity, speaks pity and blessing for him. No very original scheme, perhaps, for a composer of Strauss's fertile, well-furnished, ever eager mind. Yet a scheme that for scope and diversity has hardly been matched in the whole development of the symphonic poem, demanding a super-mastery of design, progress, cumulation, unity; inexhaustible inventive resource; the utmost command of technical means; the "staying power" of imagination and projection stretched to the utmost. Merely to perceive and to contemplate Strauss's plan is to stir with admiration.

That admiration expands and deepens when this design, at once vast and minute, is accomplished upon ear and mind un[illegible]ingly. Like or mislike the scheme, the [illegible] both; yet at every turn Strauss holds and fulfils his purpose, undimmed of mind, undulled of heart, unwearied of hand. True he taxes the listeners, assumes in them in a considerable degree of musical intelligence, quickness, concentration, preparation—large askings for the transient, scatter-witted commerce of the concert-hall. Some of the variations are remote enough from the theme, intricately evolved from it. Yet the linking, unifying chain never quite breaks—especially when the performance is as luminous and close-knit as was Mr. Monteux's. From the beginnings in "Don Juan," a perverse inclination to minute detail has pursued Strauss and often vexed hearers. (There used to be a joke in Munich according to which certain measures in that earliest tone-poem implied red locks upon the pate of one of the enamored ladies.) Akin is Strauss's inclination to write, for a moment and possibly for his own satisfaction, "paper-music"—that is music to be read rather than heard and of little or no implication in the swift interchanges of performance. Here and there he writes such measures in the variations of "Don Quixote" and thereby buries listeners' heads in the programme books whereas they should be upraised to the orchestra.

A like impulse in Strauss, with similar hint of perversity, impels him toward the grotesque—not too fair or fruitful field with music "absolute" or delineative. The sheep that Don Quixote fancies an emperor's host must bleat in muted brass. When the knight, earth-bound, yet fancies he rides the air, a wind-machine, borrowed from the theatre, must whirr and puff in comic obbligato. In double bassoon and tuba, Sancho, falling asleep, must snore like a whole dormitory in a lodging house. No doubt there is a small measure of humor and a large measure of technical ingenuity in these strokes. They do sharpen the grotesquerie sought by Strauss in some of the variations. None the less, they are lapses, like sundry others in the music of his maturity, from his usual standards of tonal narrative and characterization, touched with beauty, power, poetry. Such variations fall below the humor and the pity of the variation of the peasant wench encountered as Dulcinea, the narrating flow and color, vigor and savor, of other adventures. They are far inferior to the variation of exalted speech upon knighthood, to the vision and rapture of the variation of the vigil.

In itself, the theme projecting and characterizing Don Quixote, may not be as vivid and vitalizing as that which flings Don Juan or The Hero deep into the imagination of listeners. It may lack the pungency of the tonal personification of Till, of one or another characterization in the "Sinfonia Domestica." Yet, as it seems, Strauss has invented, moulded, motioned this "knightly theme" with a clear, sure mind to his purpose. As he unfolds and intensifies it, at need it speaks with chivalric accent. If he so wills, it suggests the glamored haze of the knight's mind as he conned old heroic legend of quest and joust. It can germinate richly the exaltation and the ecstasy of the two variations—speech and vigil—in which the tone-poem attains the purest stuff of music. Yet most it serves two purposes that from the first Strauss must have had in mind.

As composer he would suggest the gradual hallucination of Quixote as the phantasms of knighthood steal upon and possess him. He does so in measures of the introduction that in graphic imagery remain miracles of music. The hearer creeps, the hearer quivers with Don Quixote. The theme aids such purpose. It helps also to fulfill another and finer end. Time and again in the tone-poem Strauss—the truly human Strauss, the Strauss knowing and feeling the tragicomedy which is life—would strike the note of pity for Cervantes's poor knight beset

To some sensitive, attuned ears, it will whisper of a sudden and for the instant, out of this or that variation. In the introduction, as in tremulous insinuation, it is discoverable. From the end of the variation of final knightly discomfiture, it pervades the Finale. If it is in a peace, both remembering and forgetting, that Quixote, still, soothed, illumined, makes his end, pity also haunts his poor room, guards his meagre bed, is viaticum to his departing soul. With pity, with humanity, the music sings.

For with all the range and power of intellect that Strauss lavishes upon "Don Quixote," his music most prevails when it is most human. Then does it summon and sustain beauty; then does poetry suffuse it; then does it sound in illusion irresistible. The tragi-comedy, the grotesquerie, of the variations is ended—and stilled, moist-eyed, we listeners hear Don Quixote a-dying, translated, mourned. The narrative, the humors of the variations pause; barely may Sancho Panza grunt and grouch in the chosen instruments. Therewith Don Quixote speaks of the ideals, the loyalties of the chivalry which is no mediæval legend but endures eternal in the hearts of men. He speaks also of the high deeds that are its works, of the honors and glories that may—sometimes—reward it. The music expands and deepens into Strauss's far spread, soaring, incandescent melody. The great phrases flame and throb; aloft goes beauty nobly.

Again the knight keeps vigil by his arms—visioning his dreams in still, solitary ecstasy. Again the melody that is magic of imagination and illusion—and the beauty and the pity of this watch of the spirit drench summoned scene and listening ear. Strauss himself can barely mar it with that over-done quiver of harps and violins which is mere stroke of the theatre. . . . Such a masterpiece of intellect and imagination, of design and creation remains "Don Quixote," a little world of music — "Fantastical Variations on a Knightly Theme" as Strauss labelled it, fantastical variations also upon humanity and the beauty, poetry, exaltation, folly, grotesquerie, and also pity, that in mankind go everlasting.

In such music as "Don Quixote," Mr. Monteux excels, since he can vision it as in passing scene upon the theatre of his imagination, since he can direct and intensify each image and illusion, coming, going upon orchestra and audience. To Strauss's intricacies he brought his Gallic sense of lucidity; to Strauss's variety of matter, his practised sense of diversity, proportion, contrast and cumulation. The outcome was a performance as clear as it was eloquent, lacking only, here and there, the tragi-comic bite, especially with the grotesquerie, that more ironic conductors sometimes infuse. As spokesman for the knight was Mr. Bedetti at the violoncello. He missed not an accent that characterized, a phrase that pitied or ennobled. Indeed, beside such a piece and such playing, from one end of the orchestra to the other, the rest of the concert seemed hardly more than pleasant preluding.

A little Symphony of Haydn, the second, in D major, as present cataloguing goes, began the afternoon. For a few pages, the music is strangely grave, dun, introspective, almost morose—of symphonic beginnings in 1922 rather than 1795. Thereafter Haydn throws off this anticipatory mood and is as pellucid and plastic, as homely or gay as tradition could wish. Supple also and as light as may be were conductor and orchestra. Next followed brief fragments of Schumann's incidental music to Byron's tortured and turgid dramatic poem of "Manfred." The music passed as in little romantic, pictorial flair and flicker, across which played in the solo for English horn, the beauty of Mr. Speyer's tone, the grace of his phrasing, his sensibility to a music of revery and melancholy. Ill-placed, however, off the stage, too few of the audience could hear and know. His stance, possibly to be rectified this evening, was in the orchestra he enriches. Last Wagner's song of the lights, the airs, the colors of the spring which in the sanctities or the sanctimonies of "Parsifal" is called "Good-Friday Spell." No spring of passion, like that of the first act of "Die Walküre," no spring of release and aspiration, like that of "Tannhäuser," are these vernal measures. Rather are they the benediction of melody upon the loveliness of earth new-born, upon human content, warm, deep, still. A more perfect tune Wagner has hardly made.

"POPS"

On the night of May 1, the last concert in Symphony Hall having finished, the delightful spring relaxation of the "Pop" concerts will take possession and extend every night, except Sunday, through the spring and into the early summer. This is the 37th season of the historical "Pops" which are so very much Boston's own institution.

23D SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the last pair, but one of the regular series of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will take place. Pierre Monteux will on this occasion give the first public performance of the latest symphony of Frederick S. Converse, the New England composer.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Frederick S. Converse's new symphony will have its first public performance. The second half of the program will consist of selections from "Tannhauser," "Siegfried," "The Dusk of the Gods."

SPRING POPS COMING

The celebrated "Pops" will begin May 1, taking complete possession of Symphony Hall and providing Boston with music every night except Sunday through the Spring and early Summer.

This "Pops" season will be the thirty-seventh of Boston's unique institution. One potent reason for the popularity of the "Pops" lies in the skill of Agide Jacchia, conductor for five seasons, who is to preside once more. He will have a full-sized symphony orchestra of seventy-five musicians.

ADVTS-APR. 16

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8: Boston Symphony Orchestra; 23d program. Symphony, F. S. Converse (first performance); Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," "Forest Murmurs," and "The Ascent of Brunnhilde's Rock," from "Siegfried"; "Daybreak" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," from "Goetterdammerung," Wagner. There is no soloist.

Friday at 8: Ella Kolar, mezzo soprano (first time in America), assisted by the Italian Symphony Orchestra, Raeffaele Martino, conductor. Overture to "Norma," Bellini; "Voi lo sapete," Mascagni; Berceuse, Sgambati; Tambourin, Rameau; Gavotte, Martini; Aria from "Mignon," Thomas; Procession, Ippolitov-Ivanov; Introduction to Act 3 of "Lohengrin," Wagner; "Stride la Vampa," Verdi; Spanish Caprice, Rimsky Korsakov; Aria "O mio Fernando," from "La Favorita," Donizetti; "Italia," Martino.

23D SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the last pair but one of the Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the program will be divided between music of Wagner and of Frederick S. Converse. Mr. Converse's new Symphony will be performed for the first time. The second half of the program will consist of the following excerpts from Wagner's music dramas. Introduction and Bacchanale, "Tannhaeuser;" Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried," Siegfried's passage to Bruennhilde's Rock, "Daybreak," and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Dusk of the Gods."

THE "POPS" ARE COMING

Although this is only Easter, the "Pops," which bless the warmth of every spring in Boston, are already talked and thought of. They will begin the night of May 1 and thenceforward into the early summer. They will take possession of Symphony Hall every night except Sunday. The Pop Concerts are very much a part of history, for this season will be the 37th. They are also Boston's own, for envy and emulation in other cities have never led to permanent results.

Agide Jacchia, the celebrated conductor of opera, symphony and choral concerts, and of the Pops for five seasons past, will again be the leader. He will have at his command 75 musicians; a full-sized symphony orchestra of a quality which would be impossible to match anywhere in the summer season. One reason (which is one of several) for the great popularity of Agide Jacchia with Pop goers far and wide is the wealth and charm of his repertory. It ranges from Handel to Herbert, from Delibes and Strauss to the thunderous and thrilling Wagner and Tchaikovsky. Operatic selections under Mr. Jacchia's baton are in interest second only to the operas themselves. He is as keen to add a successful number as he is to drop an indifferent one. He has arranged for full orchestra some fine new pieces which will vie in popularity with his "Volga Bargemen's Song," "Dubinushka," and "Eli, Eli."

Pops programs have delights for all; they are made the more palatable by the sociable gayety that pervades the Pops, and by the refreshments that freely circulate at the tables and over the "bar" (now to be regarded as a permanent feature of the Pops). Virtually all of the societies, clubs, colleges, schools and conventions that celebrated at the Pops last year are booked for this, together with many new ones. About 97 per cent. of all Pop nights, however, are open to the public.

The music sets forth that theme and makes the first violoncello insistent and imparting voice. A secondary theme stands beside it, of the "grousing" Sancho Panza for whom tuba or bass-clarinet or viola are appointed voices. Then ensue ten variations—of Quixote's adventures usually grotesque and ludicrous; of his night-vigil and rapt visioning by his arms; of his dreams and speech upon the glories of perfect knighthood. As his hallucinations have waxed in the introduction, so they wane at the end of the variations. The finale lays him on his death-bed, leads him back again to simplicity and serenity, speaks pity and blessing for him. No very original scheme, perhaps, for a composer of Strauss's fertile, well-furnished, ever eager mind. Yet a scheme that for scope and diversity has hardly been matched in the whole development of the symphonic poem, demanding a super-mastery of design, progress, cumulation, unity; inexhaustible inventive resource; the utmost command of technical means; the "staying power" of imagination and projection stretched to the utmost. Merely to perceive and to contemplate Strauss's plan is to stir with admiration.

That admiration expands and deepens when this design, at once vast and minute, is accomplished upon ear and mind unflaggingly. Like or mislike the scheme, the [illegible] and the music which embodies both; yet at every turn Strauss holds and fulfils his purpose, undimmed of mind, undulled of heart, unwearied of hand. True he taxes the listeners, assumes in them in a considerable degree of musical intelligence, quickness, concentration, preparation—large askings for the transient, scatter-witted commerce of the concert-hall. Some of the variations are remote enough from the theme, intricately evolved from it. Yet the linking, unifying chain never quite breaks—especially when the performance is as luminous and close-knit as was Mr. Monteux's. From the beginnings in "Don Juan," a perverse inclination to minute detail has pursued Strauss and often vexed hearers. (There used to be a joke in Munich according to which certain measures in that earliest tone-poem implied red locks upon the pate of one of the enamored ladies.) Akin is Strauss's inclination to write, for a moment and possibly for his own satisfaction, "paper-music"—that is music to be read rather than heard and of little or no implication in the swift interchanges of performance. Here and there he writes such measures in the variations of "Don Quixote" and thereby buries listeners' heads in the programme books whereas they should be upraised to the orchestra.

A like impulse in Strauss, with similar hint of perversity, impels him toward the grotesque—not too fair or fruitful field with music "absolute" or delineative. The sheep that Don Quixote fancies an emperor's host must bleat in muted brass. When the knight, earth-bound, yet fancies he rides the air, a wind-machine, borrowed from the theatre, must whirr and puff in comic obbligato. In double bassoon and tuba, Sancho, falling asleep, must snore like a whole dormitory in a lodging house. No doubt there is a small measure of humor and a large measure of technical ingenuity in these strokes. They do sharpen the grotesquerie sought by Strauss in some of the variations. None the less, they are lapses, like sundry others in the music of his maturity, from his usual standards of tonal narrative and characterization, touched with beauty, power, poetry. Such variations fall below the humor and the pity of the variation of the peasant wench encountered as Dulcinea, the narrating flow and color, vigor and savor, of other adventures. They are far inferior to the variation of exalted speech upon knighthood, to the vision and rapture of the variation of the vigil.

In itself, the theme projecting and characterizing Don Quixote, may not be as vivid and vitalizing as that which flings Don Juan or The Hero deep into the imagination of listeners. It may lack the pungency of the tonal personification of Till, of one or another characterization in the "Sinfonia Domestica." Yet, as it seems, Strauss has invented, moulded, motioned this "knightly theme" with a clear, sure mind to his purpose. As he unfolds and intensifies it, at need it speaks with chivalric accent. If he so wills, it suggests the glamored haze of the knight's mind as he conned old heroic legend of quest and joust. It can germinate richly the exaltation and the ecstasy of the two variations—speech and vigil—in which the tone-poem attains the purest stuff of music. Yet most it serves two purposes that from the first Strauss must have had in mind.

As composer he would suggest the gradual hallucination of Quixote as the phantasms of knighthood steal upon and possess him. He does so in measures of the introduction that in graphic imagery remain miracles of music. The hearer creeps, the hearer quivers with Don Quixote. The theme aids such purpose. It helps also to fulfill another and finer end. Time and again in the tone-poem Strauss—the truly human Strauss, the Strauss knowing and feeling the tragicomedy which is life—would strike the note of pity for Cervantes's poor knight beset. To some sensitive, attuned ears, it will whisper of a sudden and for the instant, out of this or that variation. In the introduction, as in tremulous insinuation, it is discoverable. From the end of the variation of final knightly discomfiture, it pervades the Finale. If it is in a peace, both remembering and forgetting, that Quixote, still, soothed, illumined, makes his end, pity also haunts his poor room, guards his meagre bed, is viaticum to his departing soul. With pity, with humanity, the music sings.

For with all the range and power of intellect that Strauss lavishes upon "Don Quixote," his music most prevails when it is most human. Then does it summon and sustain beauty; then does poetry suffuse it; then does it sound in illusion irresistible. The tragi-comedy, the grotesquerie, of the variations is ended—and stilled, moist-eyed, we listeners hear Don Quixote a-dying, translated, mourned. The narrative, the humors of the variations pause; barely may Sancho Panza grunt and grouch in the chosen instruments. Therewith Don Quixote speaks of the ideals, the loyalties of the chivalry which is no mediæval legend but endures eternal in the hearts of men. He speaks also of the high deeds that are its works, of the honors and glories that may—sometimes—reward it. The music expands and deepens into Strauss's far spread, soaring, incandescent melody. The great phrases flame and throb; aloft goes beauty nobly.

Again the knight keeps vigil by his arms—visioning his dreams in still, solitary ecstasy. Again the melody that is magic of imagination and illusion—and the beauty and the pity of this watch of the spirit drench summoned scene and listening ear. Strauss himself can barely mar it with that over-done quiver of harps and violins which is mere stroke of the theatre. . . . Such a masterpiece of intellect and imagination, of design and creation remains "Don Quixote," a little world of music — "Fantastical Variations on a Knightly Theme" as Strauss labelled it, fantastical variations also upon humanity and the beauty, poetry, exaltation, folly, grotesquerie, and also pity, that in mankind go everlasting.

In such music as "Don Quixote," Mr. Monteux excels, since he can vision it as in passing scene upon the theatre of his imagination, since he can direct and intensify each image and illusion, coming, going upon orchestra and audience. To Strauss's intricacies he brought his Gallic sense of lucidity; to Strauss's variety of matter, his practised sense of diversity, proportion, contrast and cumulation. The outcome was a performance as clear as it was eloquent, lacking only, here and there, the tragi-comic bite, especially with the grotesquerie, that more ironic conductors sometimes infuse. As spokesman for the knight was Mr. Bedetti at the violoncello. He missed not an accent that characterized, a phrase that pitied or ennobled. Indeed, beside such a piece and such playing, from one end of the orchestra to the other, the rest of the concert seemed hardly more than pleasant preluding.

A little Symphony of Haydn, the second, in D major, as present cataloguing goes, began the afternoon. For a few pages, the music is strangely grave, dun, introspective, almost morose—of symphonic beginnings in 1922 rather than 1795. Thereafter Haydn throws off this anticipatory mood and is as pellucid and plastic, as homely or gay as tradition could wish. Supple also and as light as may be were conductor and orchestra. Next followed brief fragments of Schumann's incidental music to Byron's tortured and turgid dramatic poem of "Manfred." The music passed as in little romantic, pictorial flair and flicker, across which played in the solo for English horn, the beauty of Mr. Speyer's tone, the grace of his phrasing, his sensibility to a music of revery and melancholy. Ill-placed, however, off the stage, too few of the audience could hear and know. His stance, possibly to be rectified this evening, was in the orchestra he enriches. Last Wagner's song of the lights, the airs, the colors of the spring which in the sanctities or the sanctimonies of "Parsifal" is called "Good-Friday Spell." No spring of passion, like that of the first act of "Die Walküre," no spring of release and aspiration, like that of "Tannhäuser," are these vernal measures. Rather are they the benediction of melody upon the loveliness of earth new-born, upon human content, warm, deep, still. A more perfect tune Wagner has hardly made.

"POPS"

On the night of May 1, the last concert in Symphony Hall having finished, the delightful spring relaxation of the "Pop" concerts will take possession and extend every night, except Sunday, through the spring and into the early summer. This is the 37th season of the historical "Pops" which are so very much Boston's own institution.

23D SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the last pair, but one of the regular series of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will take place. Pierre Monteux will on this occasion give the first public performance of the latest symphony of Frederick S. Converse, the New England composer.

TRAN APR. 15

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Frederick S. Converse's new symphony will have its first public performance. The second half of the program will consist of selections from "Tannhauser," "Siegfried," "The Dusk of the Gods."

SPRING POPS COMING

The celebrated "Pops" will begin May 1, taking complete possession of Symphony Hall and providing Boston with music every night except Sunday through the Spring and early Summer.

This "Pops" season will be the thirty-seventh of Boston's unique institution. One potent reason for the popularity of the "Pops" lies in the skill of Agide Jacchia, conductor for five seasons, who is to preside once more. He will have a full-sized symphony orchestra of seventy-five musicians.

ADVTS-APR. 16

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8: Boston Symphony Orchestra; 23d program. Symphony, F. S. Converse (first performance); Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," "Forest Murmurs," and "The Ascent of Brunnhilde's Rock," from "Siegfried"; "Daybreak" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," from "Goetterdammerung," Wagner. There is no soloist.

Friday at 8: Ella Kolar, mezzo soprano (first time in America), assisted by the Italian Symphony Orchestra, Raefaele Martino, conductor. Overture to "Norma," Bellini; "Voi lo sapete," Mascagni; Berceuse, Sgambati; Tambourin, Rameau; Gavotte, Martini; Aria from "Mignon," Thomas; Procession, Ippolitov-Ivanov; Introduction to Act 3 of "Lohengrin," Wagner; "Stride la Vampa," Verdi; Spanish Caprice, Rimsky Korsakov; Aria "O mio Fernando," from "La Favorita," Donizetti; "Italia," Martino.

23D SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the last pair but one of the Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the program will be divided between music of Wagner and of Frederick S. Converse. Mr. Converse's new Symphony will be performed for the first time. The second half of the program will consist of the following excerpts from Wagner's music dramas. Introduction and Bacchanale, "Tannhaeuser;" Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried," Siegfried's passage to Bruennhilde's Rock, "Daybreak," and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Dusk of the Gods."

THE "POPS" ARE COMING

Although this is only Easter, the "Pops," which bless the warmth of every spring in Boston, are already talked and thought of. They will begin the night of May 1 and thenceforward into the early summer. They will take possession of Symphony Hall every night except Sunday. The Pop Concerts are very much a part of history, for this season will be the 37th. They are also Boston's own, for envy and emulation in other cities have never led to permanent results.

Agide Jacchia, the celebrated conductor of opera, symphony and choral concerts, and of the Pops for five seasons past, will again be the leader. He will have at his command 75 musicians; a full-sized symphony orchestra of a quality which would be impossible to match anywhere in the summer season. One reason (which is one of several) for the great popularity of Agide Jacchia with Pop goers far and wide is the wealth and charm of his repertory. It ranges from Handel to Herbert, from Delibes and Strauss to the thunderous and thrilling Wagner and Tchaikovsky. Operatic selections under Mr. Jacchia's baton are in interest second only to the operas themselves. He is as keen to add a successful number as he is to drop an indifferent one. He has arranged for full orchestra some fine new pieces which will vie in popularity with his "Volga Bargemen's Song," "Dubinushka," and "Eli, Eli."

Pops programs have delights for all; they are made the more palatable by the sociable gayety that pervades the Pops, and by the refreshments that freely circulate at the tables and over the "bar" (now to be regarded as a permanent feature of the Pops). Virtually all of the societies, clubs, colleges, schools and conventions that celebrated at the Pops last year are booked for this, together with many new ones. About 97 per cent. of all Pop nights, however, are open to the public.

DESPITE the frequent repetition of Wagner's judgment that the symphony is an outworn and exhausted medium of musical expression, the form continues to thrive and prosper. Symphonies that are acknowledged masterpieces have been written by two living composers of the elder generation, d'Indy and Sibelius. Within the past year the English Vaughan Williams and the French Roussel have made notable contributions to the species; while even younger men, such as Santoliquido and Sowerby, reared in the very atmosphere of "modernism," must try their hands at symphonic writing. Recently, however, American symphonies have not been plentiful. Not since Mr. Monteux, in January, 1920, played Mr. Converse's Symphony inspired by the late war has one come to our Symphony Concerts; and as it happens, it is Mr. Converse himself who breaks the silence with a new Symphony in E major to be heard tomorrow and Saturday.

By testimony of the music-dictionaries this Symphony should be numbered three; but the composer evidently disregards his first and unpublished effort and the piece now impending he labels "Number Two." It has occupied him since June of 1920, and it has been but lately completed. If the composer had a programme in mind—and there are suggestions in the score that he had—he wisely lets his hearers discover it and interpret for themselves. The "programme-symphony" is a dangerous compromise that even Beethoven could hardly manage.

At the beginning the mood of the music is sombre. Brass instruments intone a solemn chant, in the Phrygian Mode, against running figures in the strings. Agitated, energetic figures anticipate the first theme of the succeeding Allegro con Fuoco, which follows after a long crying theme for the trumpet. This first subject is proclaimed, in E minor, by divided double basses, and the almost savage emphasis that characterizes it, persists through much of the movement. After a shattering climax, measures of transition lead to the lyrical, consoling second theme, in G minor, begun by the first oboe and continued by 'celli and horn. The broad, reposeful concluding theme, which does not appear full-blown until the end of the movemnt, is now suggested fragmentarily. The short development treats of all three subjects, and reaches a climax with a sonorous statement, by full orchestra, of the second. The recapitulation, which begins regularly with a return to the first subject, soon takes the form of an extended coda. In still more tranquil guise the second theme returns for flute; it is developed at length, and after a broad climax the reassuring, concluding subject—a chorale-like melody sung by horn and trumpet—appears in true estate. Following a sonorous affirmation of this theme by the whole orchestra the music comes to a serene and quiet end.

Four measures of rich harmony begin the second division of the symphony, which, Mr. Converse chooses to make Slow Movement and Scherzo in one. The violoncellos sing a broad melody in A major that seems almost naive after the turbulence and complexity that has come before. These placid strains lead abruptly to a gay and playful Scherzo in D-flat major. The strongly rhythmed motiv from which the Scherzo is largely derived is said by the composer to be of Indian origin. A lyrical theme makes contrast, and the two sport together with increasing animation—to be suddenly halted by a fortissimo chord, for brass and kettledrums, that seems at the hand of arresting Fate. Violins whirr protestingly, but the play is ended, and the chords, growing quieter, lead to a return to the opening section. The songful theme now goes to violas and English horn. It is developed more elaborately than before and therewith the movement ends peacefully.

The Finale begins with a broad melody, in C major, for basses (Andante Sostenuto). It is developed and followed in turn by an expresive theme, warmly harmonized, that is to appear later in the main body of the movement, which itself takes the form of a Rondo. The spirited principal subject is announced by the horn; the key is now E major and the mood is frankly buoyant and cheerful. A chromatic melody for strings (Meno Mosso ed Espressivo) serves as the first subsidiary theme, and the lyrical melody of the Introduction becomes the second subsidiary. The conclusion is brilliant and exciting.

From the foregoing survey it appears that Mr. Converse has adhered to traditional form when it suited his purpose and disregarded it when it did not. So doing he follows the ways of other symphonists of our immediate time. As far as harmony is concerned he writes freely, even boldly, but not chaotically or anarchistically; while he does not disdain melody. His easy command over the modern orchestra was long ago proved, and his latest score is replete with arresting effects and striking sonorities. And, as often in the past, he has written a lusty, full-blooded, manful music.

F. S. Converse's New Symphony to Get a Hearing

At the next pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday and Saturday, April 21 and 22, will be played for the first time anywhere Frederick S. Converse's Second Symphony in E major. The production of this work by so distinguished an American composer is an occasion of no little importance, not only to the musical public of Boston but also to the musical world generally.

Mr. Converse's symphony in several respects differs from the usually accepted symphonic structure. It is in three movements and although there is strictly speaking no scherzo or adagio, the elements of these two movements are introduced in the other parts of the symphony in such a manner that due contrast is maintained and variety in the work as a whole is secured.

The symphony opens with a short introduction in the Phrygian mode, [illegible], and after a short climax in which a salient figure is sounded by the horns, echoed by the trumpets, leads by means of passage work in the lower strings and bassoons into the opening allegro.

Frederick S. Conversé, Whose Second Symphony Is to Be Played in Boston

The stormy first subject is announced as a fugato, followed by a more lyrical second subject, destined to play a most important part in the development of the movement. This in turn is succeeded by a chorale-like third theme, brought to a resounding climax.

The development follows, consisting of various combinations of the first and second subjects leading to a forceful restatement of the latter, which forms the climax of this section.

The coda is long and highly developed. Against chords of the harp and higher strings and wind the horn intones a reminiscence of the second subject. The movement ends pianissimo.

The second movement, which may perhaps best be described as an intermezzo, opens in quiet mood and leads directly into a quicker section which takes the place of the scherzo proper. The quiet opening measures return, bringing the movement to a close.

The last movement begins with a lengthy slow introduction, which together with a slow section introduced later in the movement, take the place of the traditional adagio. The other portions of the movement are admirably contrasted with the mood of the opening measures. Mr. Converse began this symphony in 1920, when the first sketches were made. It is scored for a large modern orchestra.

MONITOR - APR 20

For the first of the Pop Concerts on May 1, in Symphony Hall, Mr. Jacchia will set on his programme a Suite of Dances in the ballet, "La Boutique Fantasque," which Respighi wove together from scraps of Rossini. At home Bostonians have heard as yet none of this bright, gay, effervescent music.

Symphony Plays Converse Work

Frederick S. Converse's Symphony No. 2 in three movements was given its final performance by the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Mr. Converse, who was in the audience, was called to his feet again and again to bow his acknowledgments, following Conductor Monteux's fine handling of the composer's work.

The second part was wholly Wagnerian and consisted of the final scene, first act from Tannhauser, "Forest Murmurs," from Seigfried and "Dusk of the Gods" from the same opera.

NEW SYMPHONY BY CONVERSE PRODUCED

Boston Composer's Work Shows Many Moods

Very Cordially Greeted at Concert of Symphony Orchestra

The novelty on yesterday's Symphony concert program was a new symphony in E major by F. S. Converse of Boston. The composer, who was present, must have been gratified by the warmth with which it was received by the audience. Few first performances of American compositions have been as cordially greeted by the Boston Symphony subscribers. This piece is a succession of many moods rather than an attempt to follow the formulas given in text books on composition. Mr Converse states that it has no literary program to tell the hearers what it means. He wisely distrusts both analytical and rhapsodical commentaries on his work.

The music seemed yesterday of uneven merit, remarkably moving and finely wrought when at its best; reminiscent of Rimsky Korsakov and Wagner when at its worst. The first andante in the second movement has the greatest immediate appeal to the listener. This symphony, whatever its ultimate worth, is not dull and far from trivial. Mr Converse has felt deeply and variously. He has succeeded in conveying to the listener something of the perplexity and glory of life.

One wondered whether it was wise to employ a full orchestra so much of the time. The Wagner excerpts which followed Mr Converse's piece are more brilliantly, if less fully scored. One also guessed that Mr Monteux took the introduction to the first movement rather faster and less majestically than the composer intended. In the main, however, the performance seemed very carefully prepared and very capably executed.

Mr Monteux has brought up Wagner's total in the list of works played this season to what it ought to be by getting a whole batch of excerpts from his music dramas out of the way at yesterday's concert. Beethoven symphonies are still in arrears, and more Mozart is needed, but otherwise the seasonal averages will come out about as they should, according to precedent.

The Paris version of the overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" was exceptionally well played. Mr Monteux has never done anything better here. The "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" went less well, though creditably. The Richter selections from the Ring, with the end of the finale from "Gotterdammerung," added, were not especially well given. Mr Monteux seems to do Wagner ballets better than Wagner heroics, which possibly strike him as a bit stodgy and pompous.

The last program, next week, instead of a Beethoven symphony, has Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherazade" as its chief item. Shreker's "Prelude to a Drama," repeated for reasons unspecified, a selection from Chabrier's "Gwendoline," and three dance numbers from Gretry's "Cephale et Procris," are the other numbers. There will be no soloist.

CONVERSE'S SYMPHONY PERFORMED

Sincerity of the Music Impressed Upon Listeners

Frederick S. Converse's second symphony was played for the first time anywhere yesterday afternoon with the 23d programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, in Symphony Hall. The composer was present and the symphony was received with exceptional enthusiasm.

HONEST MUSIC ANYWAY

The latter half of the programme consisted of excerpts from Wagnerian music-drama: the Introduction and Bacchanale of the Paris version of "Tannhauser"; the Forest Music from the third act of "Siegfried"; and Richter's arrangement, with a conclusion designed by Mr. Monteux, of passages from "Siegfried" and the "Dusk of the Gods."

The sincerity and the character of Mr. Converse, as man and artist, show in his music. He has told the public little about his symphony. An explanation of its meaning he does not wish to lay before a hearer. It is enough—witness his letter published in the programme book—for the hearer to know that "it is a succession of many moods of suffering, of resolute defiance, of consolation, hope and joy, moods which all of us experience in life; to which I have tried to give expression in this form. I only hope that the music will not be boring to many, and that some will be moved by it."

In Three Movements

Three movements balance each other in the accepted symphonic manner. Certain themes are significantly transformed, but, again, in a manner made logical by the musical and emotional development. There are many modern compositions in which the composer plucks you by the sleeve—"Did you notice that? That's the second theme of the first movement in disguise." The symphony heard yesterday is only the work of a man with a conviction, who puts down what he feels.

The sincerity of the music made itself felt. Whether there is as much distinction of the thematic material as in other music of Mr. Converse's is a question to be decided with future hearings. We personally rate this symphony much higher, for example, than the symphonic poem, "Ormazd," or the recent symphony in C minor. It is the more substantial in idea and workmanship. The climaxes are not pulled in, but arrive logically, inescapably, with the development of the ideas. Thus the dramatic recapitulation of certain matter toward the end of the first movement, and the conclusion, preceded by a broad and effective version of a theme heard earlier in the movement, of the finale. Mr. Converse was several times called to his feet at the close of the performance.

Perhaps it is because it is heard less often, but we personally enjoy the later Wagner much more than the earlier one. From the place where "Tannhauser" was revamped for Paris the music has a finer color, even if it is spoiled now and then by extra measures put in for the benefit of ballet and spectators, by frenzy long drawn out, even on the stage, and too long drawn out for the concert hall. One listened to a noisy performance of noisy music, redeemed by the poetic close. The Forest Music again wove its spell.

The conclusion of the Richter arrangement of music from the Ring gains by the addition of the last crashing pages of the Immolation scene from "Die Gotterdamerung." It is the fashion of some to say that color is only the exterior of music, but suppose these superb pages of "Gotterdamerung" were relieved of the gorgeous, ritualistic pomp of the brass, thundering out the motive of the old, dying gods, or the peculiar scintillating brilliancy that wood-winds adds to the effect of strings—woud we have even half of the substance—not merely the effect, but the very substance—of Wagner's imagination? The performance displayed to the full the capacities of the orchestra, in familiar music, and Mr. Monteux made much of the finale.

23D CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Work by Converse Performed for First Time —Well Received

WAGNER EXCERPTS

REST OF PROGRA

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Converse, Symphony No. 2, E major; Wagner, Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"; "Forest Murmurs," from 'Siegfried"; Siegfried's passage to Bruennhilde's Rock from "Siegfried"; Morning Dawn, Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Close, from "Dusk of the Gods."

Mr. Converse's symphony was performed for the first time. In his modest notes contributed to the program book, he said: "There is no program to my symphony, although it is a succession of many moods of suffering, of resolute defiance, of consolation, hope and joy, which moods all of us experience in life; to which I have tried to give expression in this form." He did not pin tags on his themes or explain their various developments, for he preferred to let the music speak for itself. Mirabile dictu, though living in the year 1922 he did not find it necessary for the expression of his thoughts to add to the orchestra a xylophone and a tam-tam, though he knew that the free use of them with other percussion instruments would, especially in the final apotheosis, excite the applause of the many that delight in a prodigious din.

The symphony is, indeed, a succession of moods, but not in the impressionistic manner after which some toil today. The second movement, a melodious and expressive Andante with a middle section of a gay Scherzo nature—we say "gay," for there are symphonic scherzos that are deliberately sour, or gloomy—some find irony in them—seems to us the most spontaneous and the most arresting portion of the work. The simplicity of the Andante, a simplicity that is not affected, is engaging. The music is gently emotional; music that at once puts the hearer in a contemplative mood and is pleasantly remembered. The gayety of the included Scherzo is not disturbing; it does not master the prevailing mood.

The first movement has a nervously dramatic introduction, which is followed by an allegro characterized for the most part by storm and stress, although there are relieving contrasts and episodes. At times in the development of the themes there seems to be a halting in transitional sentences, as if the composer were anxious for the voice of some solo instrument. There is ornamentation at times that seems to us superfluous, occasional filigree, which does not sufficiently cover bare, thin measures. The close has a quiet charm which prepares the hearer for the movement to follow.

The Finale is more closely knit; it has a more continuous flow of musical thought. The symphony is the work of a serious, wellgrounded musician, respecting his art, who seeks in music to express his thoughts and emotions without undue regard for the opinion of an audience. Yesterday the symphony was well received. The applause was especially hearty after the second movement. After the Finale Mr. Converse was obliged to bow in recognition. Mr. Monteux had evidently taken great pains in the preparation of the performance as was shown by the results achieved.

The rest of the program was devoted to excerpts from Wagner's operas. The attitude of the successive conductors of this orchestra towards performance of extracts from the music dramas would be a subject for an interesting article. One would be willing to play the vulgar, clap-trap "Rienzi" overture and even the atrocious Emperor's march, but would say "No" to any pages from "The Ring." Another would draw the line at "Parsifal." To play any portion of it in concert would be sacrilegious. As a matter of fact, Wagner himself was by no means so squeamish. In his lifetime he encouraged concert performances of music from "The Ring." And, lo, Hans Richter, the great high-priest of the temple, arranged the suite from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods," which was played yesterday, although Mr. Monteux, more respectful, substituted measures by Wagner for Richter's ending.

The performance of the Bacchanale was one of dazzling brilliance. "Forest Murmurs" loses a good deal of its beauty and significance in the concert hall. There is need of the forest, the flickering light, the sight of the outdoor life and the heroic youth listening to the informing bird. Siegfried's Rhine Journey is another story. Wagner himself called it an orchestral scherzo.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week, the last of the 41st season, is as follows: Gretry-Mottl, Three Dances from "Cephalus and Procris"; Chabrier, Prelude to Act II of "Gwendoline"; Sehreker, Prelude to a Drama; Rimsky-Korsakov, "Scheherazade."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The last but one of the season's symphonies was given yesterday, Mr. Monteux conductor. There was no soloist, but the program was such an interesting one that nobody minded.

The symphony in E major by Frederick S. Converse opened the program, and the following Wagner numbers completed the afternoon: Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"; "Forest Murmurs" from "Seigfried," and several parts of the third act of "Seigfried" skilfully combined.

The work of Mr. Converse was performed for the first time at this pair of concerts and the audience found it very interesting. Mr. Converse, who was present, held an informal reception for his many friends and admirers. He and Mr. Monteux were both called again and again to acknowledge the long-continued plaudits of the [illegible] which was more than

DESPITE the frequent repetition of Wagner's judgment that the symphony is an outworn and exhausted medium of musical expression, the form continues to thrive and prosper. Symphonies that are acknowledged masterpieces have been written by two living composers of the elder generation, d'Indy and Sibelius. Within the past year the English Vaughan Williams and the French Roussel have made notable contributions to the species; while even younger men, such as Santoliquido and Sowerby, reared in the very atmosphere of "modernism," must try their hands at symphonic writing. Recently, however, American symphonies have not been plentiful. Not since Mr. Monteux, in January, 1920, played Mr. Converse's Symphony inspired by the late war has one come to our Symphony Concerts; and as it happens, it is Mr. Converse himself who breaks the silence with a new Symphony in E major to be heard tomorrow and Saturday.

By testimony of the music-dictionaries this Symphony should be numbered three; but the composer evidently disregards his first and unpublished effort and the piece now impending he labels "Number Two." It has occupied him since June of 1920, and it has been but lately completed. If the composer had a programme in mind—and there are suggestions in the score that he had—he wisely lets his hearers discover it and interpret for themselves. The "programme-symphony" is a dangerous compromise that even Beethoven could hardly manage.

At the beginning the mood of the music is sombre. Brass instruments intone a solemn chant, in the Phrygian Mode, against running figures in the strings. Agitated, energetic figures anticipate the first theme of the succeeding Allegro con Fuoco, which follows after a long crying theme for the trumpet. This first subject is proclaimed, in E minor, by divided double basses, and the almost savage emphasis that characterizes it, persists through much of the movement. After a shattering climax, measures of transition lead to the lyrical, consoling second theme, in G minor, begun by the first oboe and continued by 'celli and horn. The broad, reposeful concluding theme, which does not appear full-blown until the end of the movemnt, is now suggested fragmentarily. The short development treats of all three subjects, and reaches a climax with a sonorous statement, by full orchestra, of the second. The recapitulation, which begins regularly with a return to the first subject, soon takes the form of an extended coda. In still more tranquil guise the second theme returns for flute; it is developed at length, and after a broad climax the reassuring, concluding subject—a chorale-like melody sung by horn and trumpet—appears in true estate. Following a sonorous affirmation of this theme by the whole orchestra the music comes to a serene and quiet end.

Four measures of rich harmony begin the second division of the symphony, which, Mr. Converse chooses to make Slow Movement and Scherzo in one. The violoncellos sing a broad melody in A major that seems almost naive after the turbulence and complexity that has come before. These placid strains lead abruptly to a gay and playful Scherzo in D-flat major. The strongly rhythmed motiv from which the Scherzo is largely derived is said by the composer to be of Indian origin. A lyrical theme makes contrast, and the two sport together with increasing animation—to be suddenly halted by a fortissimo chord, for brass and kettledrums, that seems at the hand of arresting Fate. Violins whirr protestingly, but the play is ended, and the chords, growing quieter, lead to a return to the opening section. The songful theme now goes to violas and English horn. It is developed more elaborately than before and therewith the movement ends peacefully.

The Finale begins with a broad melody, in C major, for basses (Andante Sostenuto). It is developed and followed in turn by an expresive theme, warmly harmonized, that is to appear later in the main body of the movement, which itself takes the form of a Rondo. The spirited principal subject is announced by the horn; the key is now E major and the mood is frankly buoyant and cheerful. A chromatic melody for strings (Meno Mosso ed Espressivo) serves as the first subsidiary theme, and the lyrical melody of the Introduction becomes the second subsidiary. The conclusion is brilliant and exciting.

From the foregoing survey it appears that Mr. Converse has adhered to traditional form when it suited his purpose and disregarded it when it did not. So doing he follows the ways of other symphonists of our immediate time. As far as harmony is concerned he writes freely, even boldly, but not chaotically or anarchistically; while he does not disdain melody. His easy command over the modern orchestra was long ago proved, and his latest score is replete with arresting effects and striking sonorities. And, as often in the past, he has written a lusty, full-blooded, manful music.

F. S. Converse's New Symphony to Get a Hearing

At the next pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday and Saturday, April 21 and 22, will be played for the first time anywhere Frederick S. Converse's Second Symphony in E major. The production of this work by so distinguished an American composer is an occasion of no little importance, not only to the musical public of Boston but also to the musical world generally.

Mr. Converse's symphony in several respects differs from the usually accepted symphonic structure. It is in three movements and although there is strictly speaking no scherzo or adagio, the elements of these two movements are introduced in the other parts of the symphony in such a manner that due contrast is maintained and variety in the work as a whole is secured.

The symphony opens with a short introduction in the Phrygian mode, freely harmonized, and after a short climax in which a salient figure is sounded by the horns, echoed by the trumpets, leads by means of passage work in the lower strings and bassoons into the opening allegro.

The stormy first subject is announced as a fugato, followed by a more lyrical second subject, destined to play a most important part in the development of the movement. This in turn is succeeded by a chorale-like third theme, brought to a resounding climax.

The development follows, consisting of various combinations of the first and second subjects leading to a forceful restatement of the latter, which forms the climax of this section.

The coda is long and highly developed. Against chords of the harp and higher strings and wind the horn intones a reminiscence of the second subject. The movement ends pianissimo.

The second movement, which may perhaps best be described as an intermezzo, opens in quiet mood and leads directly into a quicker section which takes the place of the scherzo proper. The quiet opening measures return, bringing the movement to a close.

The last movement begins with a lengthy slow introduction, which together with a slow section introduced later in the movement, take the place of the traditional adagio. The other portions of the movement are admirably contrasted with the mood of the opening measures. Mr. Converse began this symphony in 1920, when the first sketches were made. It is scored for a large modern orchestra.

For the first of the Pop Concerts on May 1, in Symphony Hall, Mr. Jacchia will set on his programme a Suite of Dances in the ballet, "La Boutique Fantasque," which Respighi wove together from scraps of Rossini. At home Bostonians have heard as yet none of this bright, gay, effervescent music.

Symphony Plays Converse Work

Frederick S. Converse's Symphony No. 2 in three movements was given its final performance by the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Mr. Converse, who was in the audience, was called to his feet again and again to bow his acknowledgments, following Conductor Monteux's fine handling of the composer's work.

The second part was wholly Wagnerian and consisted of the final scene, first act from Tannhauser, "Forest Murmurs," from Seigfried and "Dusk of the Gods" from the same opera.

NEW SYMPHONY BY CONVERSE PRODUCED

Boston Composer's Work Shows Many Moods

Very Cordially Greeted at Concert of Symphony Orchestra

The novelty on yesterday's Symphony concert program was a new symphony in E major by F. S. Converse of Boston. The composer, who was present, must have been gratified by the warmth with which it was received by the audience. Few first performances of American compositions have been as cordially greeted by the Boston Symphony subscribers. This piece is a succession of many moods rather than an attempt to follow the formulas given in text books on composition. Mr Converse states that it has no literary program to tell the hearers what it means. He wisely distrusts both analytical and rhapsodical commentaries on his work.

The music seemed yesterday of uneven merit, remarkably moving and finely wrought when at its best; reminiscent of Rimsky Korsakov and Wagner when at its worst. The first andante in the second movement has the greatest immediate appeal to the listener. This symphony, whatever its ultimate worth, is not dull and far from trivial. Mr Converse has felt deeply and variously. He has succeeded in conveying to the listener something of the perplexity and glory of life.

One wondered whether it was wise to employ a full orchestra so much of the time. The Wagner excerpts which followed Mr Converse's piece are more brilliantly, if less fully scored. One also guessed that Mr Monteux took the introduction to the first movement rather faster and less majestically than the composer intended. In the main, however, the performance seemed very carefully prepared and very capably executed.

Mr Monteux has brought up Wagner's total in the list of works played this season to what it ought to be by getting a whole batch of excerpts from his music dramas out of the way at yesterday's concert. Beethoven symphonies are still in arrears, and more Mozart is needed, but otherwise the seasonal averages will come out about as they should, according to precedent.

The Paris version of the overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" was exceptionally well played. Mr Monteux has never done anything better here. The "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" went less well, though creditably. The Richter selections from the Ring, with the end of the finale from "Gotterdammerung," added, were not especially well given. Mr Monteux seems to do Wagner ballets better than Wagner heroics, which possibly strike him as a bit stodgy and pompous.

The last program, next week, instead of a Beethoven symphony, has Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade" as its chief item. Shreker's "Prelude to a Drama," repeated for reasons unspecified, a selection from Chabrier's "Gwendoline," and three dance numbers from Gretry's "Cephale et Procris," are the other numbers. There will be no soloist.

CONVERSE'S SYMPHONY PERFORMED

Sincerity of the Music Impressed Upon Listeners

Frederick S. Converse's second symphony was played for the first time anywhere yesterday afternoon with the 23d programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, in Symphony Hall. The composer was present and the symphony was received with exceptional enthusiasm.

HONEST MUSIC ANYWAY

The latter half of the programme consisted of excerpts from Wagnerian music-drama: the Introduction and Bacchanale of the Paris version of "Tannhauser"; the Forest Music from the third act of "Siegfried"; and Richter's arrangement, with a conclusion designed by Mr. Monteux, of passages from "Siegfried" and the "Dusk of the Gods."

The sincerity and the character of Mr. Converse, as man and artist, show in his music. He has told the public little about his symphony. An explanation of its meaning he does not wish to lay before a hearer. It is enough—witness his letter published in the programme book—for the hearer to know that "it is a succession of many moods of suffering, of resolute defiance, of consolation, hope and joy, moods which all of us experience in life; to which I have tried to give expression in this form. I only hope that the music will not be boring to many, and that some will be moved by it."

In Three Movements

Three movements balance each other in the accepted symphonic manner. Certain themes are significantly transformed, but, again, in a manner made logical by the musical and emotional development. There are many modern compositions in which the composer plucks you by the sleeve—"Did you notice that? That's the second theme of the first movement in disguise." The symphony heard yesterday is only the work of a man with a conviction, who puts down what he feels.

The sincerity of the music made itself felt. Whether there is as much distinction of the thematic material as in other music of Mr. Converse's is a question to be decided with future hearings. We personally rate this symphony much higher, for example, than the symphonic poem, "Ormazd," or the recent symphony in C minor. It is the more substantial in idea and workmanship. The climaxes are not pulled in, but arrive logically, inescapably, with the development of the ideas. Thus the dramatic recapitulation of certain matter toward the end of the first movement, and the conclusion, preceded by a broad and effective version of a theme heard earlier in the movement, of the finale. Mr. Converse was several times called to his feet at the close of the performance.

Perhaps it is because it is heard less often, but we personally enjoy the later Wagner much more than the earlier one. From the place where "Tannhauser" was revamped for Paris the music has a finer color, even if it is spoiled now and then by extra measures put in for the benefit of ballet and spectators, by frenzy long drawn out, even on the stage, and too long drawn out for the concert hall. One listened to a noisy performance of noisy music, redeemed by the poetic close. The Forest Music again wove its spell.

The conclusion of the Richter arrangement of music from the Ring gains by the addition of the last crashing pages of the Immolation scene from "Die Gotterdamerung." It is the fashion of some to say that color is only the exterior of music, but suppose these superb pages of "Gotterdamerung" were relieved of the gorgeous, ritualistic pomp of the brass, thundering out the motive of the old, dying gods, or the peculiar scintillating brilliancy that wood-winds adds to the effect of strings—woud we have even half of the substance—not merely the effect, but the very substance—of Wagner's imagination? The performance displayed to the full the capacities of the orchestra, in familiar music, and Mr. Monteux made much of the finale.

23D CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Work by Converse Performed for First Time —Well Received

WAGNER EXCERPTS

REST OF PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Converse, Symphony No. 2, E major; Wagner, Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"; "Forest Murmurs," from 'Siegfried"; Siegfried's passage to Bruennhilde's Rock from "Siegfried"; Morning Dawn, Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Close, from "Dusk of the Gods."

Mr. Converse's symphony was performed for the first time. In his modest notes contributed to the program book, he said: "There is no program to my symphony, although it is a succession of many moods of suffering, of resolute defiance, of consolation, hope and joy, which moods all of us experience in life; to which I have tried to give expression in this form." He did not pin tags on his themes or explain their various developments, for he preferred to let the music speak for itself. Mirabile dictu, though living in the year 1922 he did not find it necessary for the expression of his thoughts to add to the orchestra a xylophone and a tam-tam, though he knew that the free use of them with other percussion instruments would, especially in the final apotheosis, excite the applause of the many that delight in a prodigious din.

The symphony is, indeed, a succession of moods, but not in the impressionistic manner after which some toil today. The second movement, a melodious and expressive Andante with a middle section of a gay Scherzo nature—we say "gay," for there are symphonic scherzos that are deliberately sour or gloomy—some find irony in them—seems to us the most spontaneous and the most arresting portion of the work. The simplicity of the Andante, a simplicity that is not affected, is engaging. The music is gently emotional; music that at once puts the bearer in a contemplative mood and is pleasantly remembered. The gayety of the included Scherzo is not disturbing; it does not master the prevailing mood.

The first movement has a nervously dramatic introduction, which is followed by an allegro characterized for the most part by storm and stress, although there are relieving contrasts and episodes. At times in the development of the themes there seems to be a halting in transitional sentences, as if the composer were anxious for the voice of some solo instrument. There is ornamentation at times that seems to us superfluous, occasional filigree, which does not sufficiently cover bare, thin measures. The close has a quiet charm which prepares the hearer for the movement to follow.

The Finale is more closely knit; it has a more continuous flow of musical thought. The symphony is the work of a serious, wellgrounded musician, respecting his art, who seeks in music to express his thoughts and emotions without undue regard for the opinion of an audience. Yesterday the symphony was well received. The applause was especially hearty after the second movement. After the Finale Mr. Converse was obliged to bow in recognition. Mr. Monteux had evidently taken great pains in the preparation of the performance as was shown by the result achieved.

The rest of the program was devoted to excerpts from Wagner's operas. The attitude of the successive conductors of this orchestra towards performance of extracts from the music dramas would be a subject for an interesting article. One would be willing to play the vulgar clap-trap "Rienzi" overture and even the atrocious Emperor's march, but would say "No" to any pages from "The Ring." Another would draw the line at "Parsifal." To play any portion of it in concert would be sacrilegious. As a matter of fact, Wagner himself was by no means so squeamish. In his lifetime he encouraged concert performances of music from "The Ring." And, lo, Hans Richter, the great high-priest of the temple, arranged the suite from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods," which was played yesterday, although Mr. Monteux, more respectful, substituted measures by Wagner for Richter's ending.

The performance of the Bacchanale was one of dazzling brilliance. "Forest Murmurs" loses a good deal of its beauty and significance in the concert hall. There is need of the forest, the flickering light, the sight of the outdoor life and the heroic youth listening to the informing bird. Siegfried's Rhine Journey is another story. Wagner himself called it an orchestral scherzo.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week, the last of the 41st season, is as follows: Gretry-Mottl, Three Dances from "Cephalus and Procris"; Chabrier, Prelude to Act II of "Gwendoline"; Sehreker, Prelude to a Drama; Rimsky-Korsakov, "Scheherazade."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The last but one of the season's symphonies was given yesterday, Mr. Monteux conductor. There was no soloist, but the program was such an interesting one that nobody minded.

The symphony in E major by Frederick S. Converse opened the program, and the following Wagner numbers completed the afternoon: Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"; "Forest Murmurs," from "Seigfried," and several parts of the third act of "Se.gfried" skilfully combined.

The work of Mr. Converse was performed for the first time at this pair of concerts and the audience found it very interesting. Mr. Converse, who was present, held an [illegible] formal reception for his [illegible] friends and admirers. He and [illegible] Monteux were both called [illegible] again and again to acknowledge the long-continued plaudits of the [illegible]ence, which was more than [illegible]

The entire Wagner music was beautifully given. On the whole, the concert was one of the best of the entire season. The program for next week, the last concert, is entirely of modern composers and should be a feast for those who prefer them to the classics.

CLOSING SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherezade," will be the last number on the 24th regular program of Symphony concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and will therefore close the symphony concert season. Pierre Monteaux will on this program repeat from an earlier pair of concerts Shreker's "Prelude to a Drama."

POPS

Every one is engaging his table for the opening night of the Pops, which of course, is the most momentous night of the spring. This will fall upon Monday, May 1, and launch the 37th season of the celebrated Pop concerts, which will continue thereafterwards every night except Sunday. Agide Jacchia will enter upon his sixth season at the head of the symphony orchestra which makes the Pops a rare institution.

On Tuesday night of the first week Wellesley will celebrate in numbers with a group of songs by the Wellesley Glee Club. This night and every other is open to the public and is of particular public interest. Thursday night will bring a Russian porgram.

Mr. Converse's New Symphony Played in Boston

The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was:

Converse—Symphony No. 2 in E major.
Wagner—Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version).
Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried."
Siegfried's Passing Through the Fire to Brünnhilde's rock; Morning Dawn and Siegfried's journey up the Rhine; Close from the "Dusk of the Gods."

The symphony by Converse was played for the first time. Beginning with a slow introduction in the Phrygian mode in which a striking melodic phrase is announced by the horns and trumpets it passes, by means of passage work in the bassoons and lower strings to the principal theme, first given out in fugato form. A more songful second theme follows and the first section of the movement concludes with a broad chorale. After a sufficiently complex development, the return of the first two themes is brought about, but this recapitulation soon merges into an extended coda. The movement ends quietly.

There is no slow movement, properly speaking. After a few measures in pensive mood, the scherzo is introduced. The movement ends with a return of the opening mood. The last movement is a rondo in which the episodes, in slower tempo, skilfully replace the traditional adagio.

There is no program to the symphony. At least the composer has vouchsafed none. Nevertheless, it is evident from the general content and plan that he must have had one in mind during the composition of the work. The music, however, is sufficiently clear in its outline and development to make this lack of little importance, however much such an addition might have added to its enjoyment and understanding. This symphony shows no striking departure from the composer's usual style and methods of composition. In fact, it conforms to the more or less conventional plan of modern symphonic writing. In spite of the composer's evident desire to stir the emotions, it is for the most part music which appeals to the intellect alone. There are melodious moments, but nowhere is the melodic line allowed to take its way free and unhampered. Did the composer fear to fall into the obvious and commonplace? In any case, the general impression seems to be one of hampering restraint.

Mr. Converse in his notes on the symphony as printed in the program book, states that he has "omitted all percussion instruments save the kettledrums, because I am tired of the cheap, conventional effects obtained by their use." To many this omission would seem to have deprived his orchestra of much color for as it stands the orchestration, while always effective and sonorous, is somewhat lacking in novelty and variety. Aside from this work in particular it is in a measure disheartening to those who look for new developments in orchestral writing to find a composer of Mr. Converse's rank thus expressing himself in regard to a group of instruments which will undoubtedly have a great influence in bringing about these changes.

It may be adopted without question that cheap and conventional effects are obtained by the use of percussion instruments, but the same may be said of any instrument now commonly found in our symphonic orchestras. Those who have read Vincent d'Indy's "Life of César Franck" will recall that a well-known French composer remarked after the first performance of Franck's D minor Symphony that it was not a symphony because it contained a part for the English horn. If the admission of new instruments and instrumental effects rested upon opinions of this sort we should still b [illegible] for the orchestra of Mozart [illegible] might possibly discard the orchestra altogether as a means of musical expression.

All this is by way of digression. Let us return to the symphony. It is closely constructed, its melodic fragments are charming (although would that there were more of them and that they were of longer breath), the working out of the material is scholarly and logical. In short it is a composition which commands respect. The audience received it with considerable enthusiasm. It was played with care and understanding by Mr. Monteux and the orchestra.

Mr. Monteux gave proof of his powers in the music of Wagner in the concert of that composer's works which he gave earlier in the season for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund. He was no less successful in the selections which he chose to play yesterday afternoon.

The playing of such fragments often leaves a sense of incompleteness in the hearer's mind particularly to those who may be familiar with the operas in their entirety. Mr. Monteux, by some magic touch succeeds in giving them a unity and roundness of form which makes them for the moment seem to be complete in themselves.

Last night, in Symphony Hall, Ella Kolar, a soprano born in Chicago of Bohemian parentage, but trained in Italy, gave a concert of operatic arias. There were orchestral selections by the Italian Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Raffaele Martino. Miss Kolar sang in a style familiar to lovers of conventional Italian opera, although she did not indulge in that exaggeration so often the outstanding fault of singers trained in that school. Evidently educated for the operatic stage, it was an ungrateful task to sing pieces so much of the theater without the accompanying dramatic action, yet she succeeded in giving admirable and often convincing interpretations of her arias without recourse to any of those incongruous tricks of gesture and voice at times resorted to by operatic singers when in the concert room.

S. M.

Friday afternoon, April 28 and Saturday evening, April 29, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, will give its twenty-fourth and concluding pair of concerts. The program will consist of a suite of ballet pieces from Grétry's opera "Céphale et Procris" transcribed by Mottl; the Overture to "Gwendoline," by Chabrier; Shreker's Prelude to a Drama already heard earlier in the season and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE PAIRING OF CONVERSE AND WAGNER

A New Symphony from the American in His Usual Quality as Composer—Reservations, Limitations and Also Clear and Characteristic Merit—Wagner Sensual and Stinging, Gentle and Musing, Heroic and Epic, with All in Orchestral Eloquence

THE new symphony of Mr. Converse, played yesterday afternoon by the Symphony Orchestra for the first time anywhere, is sound, serious, sincere music, warranting Mr. Monteux's pains of preparation, excelling the composer's modest exposition for the programme-book, justifying the hearty, honest rewarding applause. It is not music of salient individuality, high imagination, manifold workmanship. To write in such wise seems beyond Mr. Converse's powers at middle age; while—to his credit be it said—he chooses thorough-going accomplishment within them rather than futile striving for the unattainable. No more is he follower of the symphonic fashions of the hour. He sets no programme to this Second Symphony, though obviously the piece is moody; he strains not under orthodox symphonic form, ready and able to shape it to his present purposes; his modulations, his play with harmonies and timbres accord with the tonal texture of Wagner, Strauss and the elder Russians rather than with the thin web, the sharp lines, the nervous inflections of the "ultra-moderns." Outside drums, Mr. Converse denies himself every tinkling, every clanging instrument of percussion. Give him a harp, a celesta, bass-clarinet and a double-bassoon, and he can express himself through the ancient and honorable orchestra of the "great symphonists." In his own heart he looks, with his own mind he writes—in his own manner to his own purpose. However the hearer may measure the outcome, he cannot mistrust the earnestness, the pains, the honest directness of the composer.

Possibly Mr. Converse would work to better advantage in the composing of large symphonic music, were he less earnest and less deliberate. Not once in this whole Symphony in E major does he forbear his high seriousness. The first movement, until it ends in gentler measures, is tense, strenuous, stormy; the third and last does not lack propulsive vigors and sustained expansion. The slow division between indeed subdues itself to contemplative song; yet the gravity of mood and speech remains. A subdivision of this second movement is Scherzo-like; but the music is neither robust nor fantastic. Even in such measures Mr. Converse is momentarily gay more by earnest thought than by temperamental exhilaration. Throughout the two longer movements the stress of the music never relaxes upon the hearer. He believes the strain of the music-making as unrelaxing upon the composer. For himself, for Mr. Converse as well, he craves the pleasures of contrast, the solace of less intense mood and persistent expression.

An excess of deliberation, possibly as unescapable, similarly pursues Mr. Converse as composer. With a little imagination and a little knowledge—actual or speculative—of the processes of composition, the listener may almost see, hear, feel him at his work. There he would open the web of his music that some instrument or group of instruments bearing a telling phrase, cutting a significant modulation, may "sound through." Here he pauses to wind decorative arabesques about the main lines of his design or to invite the virtuosity of a sympathetic orchestra. Here he must write a series of transitional measures—and he does so in this Symphony with more invention, elasticity and suggestion than in many an earlier piece. Now he plants his feet and clinches his hands for an upswelling climax. Again he is pondering the growth and interplay of his motivs or the melody fertilized from them, considering as well the enriching harmonies, the sharpening timbres. Of course every composer in kind and degree writes music with thought, choice, calculation. With the best of them not always will imagination spark or intuition breathe full and free. Mr. Converse's processes in music making are normal; but they remain too obvious; whereas other composers of different temperament and method somehow hide them.

Seldom in this whole Symphony does the workmanship seem fluid, supple, spontaneous, taking course, current, color, reflections as it moves under the composer's hand and imagination. Mr. Converse's earnestness, Mr. Converse's deliberation—both as persistent as they are plain—often make his music sound overthick, move in too square-toed fashion. His full-voiced progressions, his luxuriant harmonies and timbres deepen this impression. As the musing reader takes a book from his shelves so also does Mr. Converse seem to choose the moods of his music. As he says in his programme-note of this "defiance, consolation, hope, joy," they are moods "that all of us experience in life." Yet, so far as the present Symphony goes, he seems less to have experienced them personally, unescapably, than to have assorted them for exposition and enforcement in tones. They are by no means inarticulate; yet, clearly, they did not cry within him for speech through music.

To make these reservations, to set out these limitations, is to circumscribe—and not to overlook or belittle—the merits of Mr. Converse's Symphony. To himself and to hearers he proposed a large design; throughout he unfolds and sustains it while once and again the return of motiv upthrown against the tonal mass is vivid and significant to hear. Though his first movement seems often over-thick and on occasion loosely cumbrous, yet does it march; yet does it speak full-throated while the few contrasting measures at the end come close to a still and tranquil beauty. The songful periods of the second movement charm. Mr. Converse has found a simple, ingratiating, pensive melody. Not too laboriously does he conduct and fertilize it; not too amply does he adorn and enrich it. For the time his harmonies are more transparent, his instrumental voices gently lambent. The ear is pleasured, to composer's mood responds hearer's fancy. The Scherzo is agreeable intermezzo, keeping the simplicity of the measures whence it comes and into which it goes. The largely marshalled, full-bodied, firm-set, upswelling finale proclaims anew the one clear individuality in Mr. Converse's maturer music. He writes as a man, safe and sane, sound and vigorous, honest, robust, candid, subject to normal, human moods, eager with normal ambitions—so composing for men who in all these things are like unto him. Through the practice of his profession, this manhood most plays. No wonder he finds sympathetic hearers—and many.

Wagner filled the rest of the afternoon in larger measure and in ampler variety than it is easy to recall over many years of the Symphony Concerts. Evidently Mr. Monteux is without scruple in the transfer to platform and to orchestra unassisted, of music designed for the stage and often clothed in many a trapping of the theatre. Such scruple, indeed, were vain and superfluous in a town that may not otherwise so much as glimpse the music-dramas. By the sign of yesterday as gladly does the public of Symphony Hall hear these rounded excerpts, these assorted and epitomizing fragments. To watch the interest, to hear the applause, it would be easy to vision a Wagner flourishing anew in Boston on operatic stage. Yet smallest, often, of the fortnight were the audiences he used to muster for the visiting Metropolitan Company; while plainly enough it was the just repute of a Toscanini or a Mahler conducting, a Fremstad or a Matzenauer singing, who had assembled them. In the opera house for which he wrote and wherein he has fullest and most vivid being, Wagner in Boston is no "draw." In the concert-hall to which he occasionally condescended and whither conductors love to lead him, he fills the room with rapt listeners. Up to Brünnhilde's rock may Siegfried go—from the chairs of Symphony Hall; but for near twenty years he has not passed through the vivid fires of the theatre. "Boston," admitted Mrs. Asquith, "is baffling."

First, in Mr. Monteux's choice, came the Overture and Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser," as the composer amplified and linked them for the Opéra in Paris—orchestral din was of a Bacchic rout, whirled, tossed, driven upon the current of the music, from it upspringing to new riot and new fires—until languor itself became as passion. Nor was Mr. Monteux content with this illusion of the whole. How acrid and sinewy he often kept the violins through this music of desire; impulsive frenzy seemed to sound tambourine or triangle; the wood-wind voices shrilled with the fierceness or melted with the softness of their caresses. In such music of the theatre Mr. Monteux is conductor to thrill and to praise.

Next the Wagner, sun-lit and glamorous, gently pictorial, tenderly musing, through the undulant, whirring, dreamful music of the epitomized "Forest Scene" of "Siegfried," with the song of the bird upon it as in flash of tonal radiance and of sudden tension dramatic. Then the Wagner who in tones can narrate of heroes, visualizing, almost, in his measures the scene, the progress, the passion—the decanted music of Siegfried scaling the fire-girt rock, of Siegfried parting from the Valkyr—"zu neuen Thaten, theure Helde"—of Siegfried breasting the wide-waved Rhine in the deepening, far-spread dawn. Upon this Wagner, master of tonal landscape, and tonal movement, spacious, exalted, epic, Mr. Monteux, of his own notion, elected to pile the final pages of "Götterdämmerung," when the orchestra, save for a single chior, rests in tumult and clamor upon earth; while that choir—the violins—mounts heavenward. Perhaps this sudden "apotheosis" smacked of the theatre of spectacle rather than the theatre of music-drama. None the less Mr. Monteux is fast mastering the broad unbroken, ever moving lines, the advancing, the receding surge, ever persistent, that in orchestral performance is the beauty, power and life of the Wagnerian word.

RIMSKY - KORSAKOV'S Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," glowing with the colors, the rhythms and fantasy of an Orient of The Arabian Nights., displayful of the orchestra as well, is the piece with which Mr. Monteux will next Friday and Saturday end the Symphony Concerts for the year. An entr'acte of mixed matter, now gentle, now sonorous, from Chabrier's Viking opera, "Gwendoline"; a suite of eighteenth-century dances from Grétry's opera, "Cephalus and Procris," rescored by Mottl; and Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama," for a composer of the hour, will fill the first half of the programme.

On Thursday evening, at the final concert of the current series in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will also be heard in Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade." The excerpts from Wagner's operas, played yesterday and today at Symphony Hall, fill the rest of the programme, viz.: The Introduction and Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser"; the epitomized Forest Scene from "Siegfried" and the measures from that music-drama and "Götterdämmerung" in which the hero climbs to Brünnhilde's fiery rock, farewells her and journeys down the Rhine to the Gibichungs' land. To all this Mr. Monteux has appended the final pages of the whole opera.

LAST SYMPHONY

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic suite, "Scheherezade," will be the big number at the closing Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Shreker's "Prelude to a Drama," dance music from the Gretry Opera, "Cephalus and Procris," and the entr'acte from Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," are the other numbers.

PROGRAM FOR POP OPENING

The classic Pop Concerts will open at Symphony Hall on Monday, May 1. Agide Jacchia will for the sixth successive summer preside over the full-sized orchestra of seventy-five players, which in the last analysis is the true glory of the Pops.

Although every program offers a real musical treat, there is a leaven of encores and lighter numbers. Light refreshments are served. The program for the opening follows:

Pops Begin May 1

The 37th season of the Pop concerts will begin at Symphony Hall May 1. As for the past five seasons, Agide Jacchia will conduct the orchestra of 75 Boston Symphony members. Soft drinks and light refreshments will be on sale as usual.

Special nights during the first week include a Wellesley celebration Tuesday with a group of songs by the Wellesley Glee Club, and a Russian program Thursday. Both are open to the public.

Friday at 2:30, and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 24th program: "Prelude to a Drama," Shreker; suite from "Cephalus and Procris," Gretry-Mottl; Entr'acte from "Gwendoline," Chabrier; "Scheheresode," Rimsky-Korsakoff. There is no soloist.

POPS TO OPEN MAY 1

A week from tomorrow night in Symphony Hall the floor seats will be removed, tables installed and the famous and favored Pop Concerts will take complete possession of every night except Sunday.

The many aspects which have made the Pops popular of late seasons will be preserved and enlarged upon in this, the 37th season. Mr. Jacchia, the finest of Pop conductors, will for the sixth successive summer preside over the full-sized symphony orchestra of 75 players, which in the last analysis is the true glory of the Pops. An operatic fantasia, overture, or ballet number, this former conductor of many distinguished opera companies leads as one who knows and loves. As for the waltzes, suites, rhapsodies and sugary [illegible] which embellish every Pops' program, it is authoritatively stated that no finer performance is to be heard anywhere. There is a leaven of encores and lighter numbers, even to operetta, to please the uninitiated. Any suggestion of seriousness is dispelled by the food, drink and conversation which, according to the time-tried manner of the Pops, flow easily, even persistently, without obtruding upon aural pleasures.

On Tuesday night of the first week Wellesley will celebrate with a group of songs by the Wellesley Glee Club. This night and every other is open to the public and is of particular public interest. Thursday night will bring a Russian program. The program for the opening night (May 1) follows:

HERALD - APR 23

In the spring the fancy of the music lover, if it turns in any direction which concerns a concert hall, turns to "Pops." These "Pop" concerts open a week from tomorrow night in Symphony Hall. They have grown in popularity of late years, until it has been possible for the management to assemble an orchestra of Boston Symphony players of sufficient proportions to play any standard composition of symphonic music, let alone the waltzes, marches, paraphrases from popular operettas which are interspersed with the more serious music on the "Pop" programmes.

Fifty per cent of the "Pop" programmes is, in fact, far nearer the offerings of the regular Boston Symphony concerts of the winter season than is generally realized. The principal difference in the musical material is its length. Symphonies in four movements are eschewed, though it is quite often that one encounters a single movement of a celebrated symphony. But suites, Wagnerian excerpts, the shorter symphonic poems, compositions ranging from Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," played next Friday and Saturday afternoon at the last pair of subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony season, to the prelude of "Tristan and Isolde," are heard, and heard with the greatest attention, and in a silence almost unduly sepulchral, by those who crowd the balconies and tables, and eat, and drink, and listen to music.

That is the effect, perhaps unforeseen a few years ago, of the Pop concerts. They furnish an amazing amount per season of the best music, but in doing so they carefully gild the pill. An audience that notes with pleasure that Victor Herbert's "Americanesque" is to be heard, goes away having discovered greatly to its surprise an equal pleasure in the march movement of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique Symphony."

This is listening at its easiest and most pleasurable. There are long enough waits between the pieces to have a chat. There are refreshments if desired. Half the terror of a long concert is in the stiffness of the chairs and the long, long stretches of music and the very brief opportunity to take a breath in between before proceeding farther. People get stiff, mentally. At the Pop concerts one sits at ease and follows the music or not, as one pleases.

It would be an excellent thing if all American artistic enterprises could provide equally painless pleasure, and lose the alarming aspect that they often present to the great public. There is a way to interest everyone in good music, to make this music irresistibly appealing to a man, whether he is informed on the subject or not. It is not necessary for him to be learned in the tonal art to feel the inspiration of great masters. These are most important facts, which the Pop concerts, for everybody's benefit, are discovering.

LAST SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite "Scherezade" will be the last number on the 24th regular program of Symphony concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This concert will close the Symphony season. Mr. Monteux will repeat Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama." The other numbers will be a suite of dances arranged by Mottl, from Gretry's "Cephalus and Procris"; also the entr'acte from Chabrier's "Gwendoline."

POST - APR. 23.

On the programme for the final concert of the season by the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge tomorrow evening stand from Wagner, not the numbers played at Symphony Hall last week, but these pieces: Introduction to Act III, Apprentices' Dance, Homage to Sachs from "Die Meistersinger"; Forest Scene from "Siegfried"; the Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung"; and The Valkyrs' Ride from "Die Walküre." Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" will begin the concert.

CLOSING SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherezade," will be the last number on the 24th regular program of Symphony concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and will therefore close the symphony concert season. Pierre Monteaux will on this program repeat from an earlier pair of concerts Shreker's "Prelude to a Drama."

POPS

Every one is engaging his table for the opening night of the Pops, which of course, is the most momentous night of the spring. This will fall upon Monday, May 1, and launch the 37th season of the celebrated Pop concerts, which will continue thereafterwards every night except Sunday. Agide Jacchia will enter upon his sixth season at the head of the symphony orchestra which makes the Pops a rare institution.

On Tuesday night of the first week Wellesley will celebrate in numbers with a group of songs by the Wellesley Glee Club. This night and every other is open to the public and is of particular public interest. Thursday night will bring a Russian porgram.

Mr. Converse's New Symphony Played in Boston

The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was:

Converse—Symphony No. 2 in E major.
Wagner—Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version).
Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried."
Siegfried's Passing Through the Fire to Brünnhilde's rock; Morning Dawn and Siegfried's journey up the Rhine; Close from the "Dusk of the Gods."

The symphony by Converse was played for the first time. Beginning with a slow introduction in the Phrygian mode in which a striking melodic phrase is announced by the horns and trumpets it passes, by means of passage work in the bassoons and lower strings to the principal theme, first given out in fugato form. A more songful second theme follows and the first section of the movement concludes with a broad chorale. After a sufficiently complex development, the return of the first two themes is brought about, but this recapitulation soon merges into an extended coda. The movement ends quietly.

There is no slow movement, properly speaking. After a few measures in pensive mood, the scherzo is introduced. The movement ends with a return of the opening mood. The last movement is a rondo in which the episodes, in slower tempo, skilfully replace the traditional adagio.

There is no program to the symphony. At least the composer has vouchsafed none. Nevertheless, it is evident from the general content and plan that he must have had one in mind during the composition of the work. The music, however, is sufficiently clear in its outline and development to make this lack of little importance, however much such an addition might have added to its enjoyment and understanding. This symphony shows no striking departure from the composer's usual style and methods of composition. In fact, it conforms to the more or less conventional plan of modern symphonic writing. In spite of the composer's evident desire to stir the emotions, it is for the most part music which appeals to the intellect alone. There are melodious moments, but nowhere is the melodic line allowed to take its way free and unhampered. Did the composer fear to fall into the obvious and commonplace? In any case, the general impression seems to be one of hampering restraint.

Mr. Converse in his notes on the symphony as printed in the program book, states that he has "omitted all percussion instruments save the kettledrums, because I am tired of the cheap, conventional effects obtained by their use." To many this omission would seem to have deprived his orchestra of much color for as it stands the orchestration, while always effective and sonorous, is somewhat lacking in novelty and variety. Aside from this work in particular it is in a measure disheartening to those who look for new developments in orchestral writing to find a composer of Mr. Converse's rank thus expressing himself in regard to a group of instruments which will undoubtedly have a great influence in bringing about these changes.

It may be adopted without question that cheap and conventional effects are obtained by the use of percussion instruments, but the same may be said of any instrument now commonly found in our symphonic orchestras. Those who have read Vincent d'Indy's "Life of César Franck" will recall that a well-known French composer remarked after the first performance of Franck's D minor Symphony that it was not a symphony because it contained a part for the English horn. If the admission of new instruments and instrumental effects rested upon opinions of this sort we should still be waiting for the orchestra of Mozart or if the argument is continued to its logical conclusion we might possibly discard the orchestra altogether as a means of musical expression.

All this is by way of digression. Let us return to the symphony. It is closely constructed, its melodic fragments are charming (although would that there were more of them and that they were of longer breath), the working out of the material is scholarly and logical. In short it is a composition which commands respect. The audience received it with considerable enthusiasm. It was played with care and understanding by Mr. Monteux and the orchestra.

Mr. Monteux gave proof of his powers in the music of Wagner in the concert of that composer's works which he gave earlier in the season for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund. He was no less successful in the selections which he chose to play yesterday afternoon.

The playing of such fragments often leaves a sense of incompleteness in the hearer's mind particularly to those who may be familiar with the operas in their entirety. Mr. Monteux, by some magic touch succeeds in giving them a unity and roundness of form which makes them for the moment seem to be complete in themselves.

Last night, in Symphony Hall, Ella Kolar, a soprano born in Chicago of Bohemian parentage, but trained in Italy, gave a concert of operatic arias. There were orchestral selections by the Italian Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Raffaele Martino. Miss Kolar sang in a style familiar to lovers of conventional Italian opera, although she did not indulge in that exaggeration so often the outstanding fault of singers trained in that school. Evidently educated for the operatic stage, it was an ungrateful task to sing pieces so much of the theater without the accompanying dramatic action, yet she succeeded in giving admirable and often convincing interpretations of her arias without recourse to any of those incongruous tricks of gesture and voice at times resorted to by operatic singers when in the concert room.

S. M.

Friday afternoon, April 28 and Saturday evening, April 29, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, will give its twenty-fourth and concluding pair of concerts. The program will consist of a suite of ballet pieces from Grétry's opera "Céphale et Procris" transcribed by Mottl; the Overture to "Gwendoline," by Chabrier; Shreker's Prelude to a Drama already heard earlier in the season and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

MONITOR - APR. 22

SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE PAIRING OF CONVERSE AND WAGNER

A New Symphony from the American in His Usual Quality as Composer—Reservations, Limitations and Also Clear and Characteristic Merit—Wagner Sensual and Stinging, Gentle and Musing, Heroic and Epic, with All in Orchestral Eloquence

THE new symphony of Mr. Converse, played yesterday afternoon by the Symphony Orchestra for the first time anywhere, is sound, serious, sincere music, warranting Mr. Monteux's pains of preparation, excelling the composer's modest exposition for the programme-book, justifying the hearty, honest rewarding applause. It is not music of salient individuality, high imagination, manifold workmanship. To write in such wise seems beyond Mr. Converse's powers at middle age; while—to his credit be it said—he chooses thorough-going accomplishment within them rather than futile striving for the unattainable. No more is he follower of the symphonic fashions of the hour. He sets no programme to this Second Symphony, though obviously the piece is moody; he strains not under orthodox symphonic form, ready and able to shape it to his present purposes; his modulations, his play with harmonies and timbres accord with the tonal texture of Wagner, Strauss and the elder Russians rather than with the thin web, the sharp lines, the nervous inflections of the "ultra-moderns." Outside drums, Mr. Converse denies himself every tinkling, every clanging instrument of percussion. Give him a harp, a celesta, bass-clarinet and a double-bassoon, and he can express himself through the ancient and honorable orchestra of the "great symphonists." In his own heart he looks, with his own mind he writes—in his own manner to his own purpose. However the hearer may measure the outcome, he cannot mistrust the earnestness, the pains, the honest directness of the composer.

Possibly Mr. Converse would work to better advantage in the composing of large symphonic music, were he less earnest and less deliberate. Not once in this whole Symphony in E major does he forbear his high seriousness. The first movement, until it ends in gentler measures, is tense, strenuous, stormy; the third and last does not lack propulsive vigors and sustained expansion. The slow division between indeed subdues itself to contemplative song; yet the gravity of mood and speech remains. A subdivision of this second movement is Scherzo-like; but the music is neither robust nor fantastic. Even in such measures Mr. Converse is momentarily gay more by earnest thought than by temperamental exhilaration. Throughout the two longer movements the stress of the music never relaxes upon the hearer. He believes the strain of the music-making as unrelaxing upon the composer. For himself, for Mr. Converse as well, he craves the pleasures of contrast, the solace of less intense mood and persistent expression.

An excess of deliberation, possibly as unescapable, similarly pursues Mr. Converse as composer. With a little imagination and a little knowledge—actual or speculative—of the processes of composition, the listener may almost see, hear, feel him at his work. There he would open the web of his music that some instrument or group of instruments bearing a telling phrase, cutting a significant modulation, may "sound through." Here he pauses to wind decorative arabesques about the main lines of his design or to invite the virtuosity of a sympathetic orchestra. Here he must write a series of transitional measures—and he does so in this Symphony with more invention, elasticity and suggestion than in many an earlier piece. Now he plants his feet and clinches his hands for an upswelling climax. Again he is pondering the growth and interplay of his motivs or the melody fertilized from them, considering as well tho enriching harmonies, the sharpening timbres. Of course every composer in kind and degree writes music with thought, choice, calculation. With the best of them not always will imagination spark or intuition breathe full and free. Mr. Converse's processes in music making are normal; but they remain too obvious; whereas other composers of different temperament and method somehow hide them.

Seldom in this whole Symphony does the workmanship seem fluid, supple, spontaneous, taking course, current, color, reflections as it moves under the composer's hand and imagination. Mr. Converse's earnestness, Mr. Converse's deliberation—both as persistent as they are plain—often make his music sound over-thick, move in too square-toed fashion. His full-voiced progressions, his luxuriant harmonies and timbres deepen this impression. As the musing reader takes a book from his shelves so also does Mr. Converse seem to choose the moods of his music. As he says in his programme-note of this "defiance, consolation, hope, joy," they are moods "that all of us experience in life." Yet, so far as the present Symphony goes, he seems less to have experienced them personally, unescapably, than to have assorted them for exposition and enforcement in tones. They are by no means inarticulate; yet, clearly, they did not cry within him for speech through music.

To make these reservations, to set out these limitations, is to circumscribe—and not to overlook or belittle—the merits of Mr Converse's Symphony. To himself and to hearers he proposed a large design throughout he unfolds and sustains it while once and again the return of motiv upthrown against the tonal mass is vivid and significant to hear. Though his first movement seems often over-thick and on occasion loosely cumbrous, yet does it march; yet does it speak full-throated while the few contrasting measures at the end come close to a still and tranquil beauty. The songful periods of the second movement charm. Mr. Converse has found a simple, ingratiating, pensive melody. Not too laboriously does he conduct and fertilize it; not too amply does he adorn and enrich it. For the time his harmonies are more transparent, his instrumental voices gently lambent. The ear is pleasured, to composer's mood responds hearer's fancy. The Scherzo is agreeable intermezzo, keeping the simplicity of the measures whence it comes and into which it goes. The largely marshalled, full-bodied, firm-set, upswelling finale proclaims anew the one clear individuality in Mr. Converse's maturer music. He writes as a man, safe and sane, sound and vigorous, honest, robust, candid, subject to normal, human moods, eager with normal ambitions—so composing for men who in all these things are like unto him. Through the practice of his profession, this manhood most plays. No wonder he finds sympathetic hearers—and many.

Wagner filled the rest of the afternoon in larger measure and in ampler variety than it is easy to recall over many years of the Symphony Concerts. Evidently Mr. Monteux is without scruple in the transfer to platform and to orchestra unassisted, of music designed for the stage and often clothed in many a trapping of the theatre. Such scruple, indeed, were vain and superfluous in a town that may not otherwise so much as glimpse the music-dramas. By the sign of yesterday as gladly does the public of Symphony Hall hear these rounded excerpts, these assorted and epitomizing fragments. To watch the interest, to hear the applause, it would be easy to vision a Wagner flourishing anew in Boston on operatic stage. Yet smallest, often, of the fortnight were the audiences he used to muster for the visiting Metropolitan Company; while plainly enough it was the just repute of a Toscanini or a Mahler conducting, a Fremstad or a Matzenauer singing, who had assembled them. In the opera house for which he wrote and wherein he has fullest and most vivid being, Wagner in Boston is no "draw." In the concert-hall to which he occasionally condescended and whither conductors love to lead him, he fills the room with rapt listeners. Up to Brünnhilde's rock may Siegfried go—from the chairs of Symphony Hall; but for near twenty years he has not passed through the vivid fires of the theatre. "Boston," admitted Mrs. Asquith, "is baffling."

First, in Mr. Monteux's choice, came the Overture and Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser," as the composer amplified and linked them for the Opéra in Paris—

tral din was of a Bacchic rout, whirled, tossed, driven upon the current of the music, from it upspringing to new riot and new fires—until languor itself became as passion. Nor was Mr. Monteux content with this illusion of the whole. How acrid and sinewy he often kept the violins through this music of desire; impulsive frenzy seemed to sound tambourine or triangle; the wood-wind voices shrilled with the fierceness or melted with the softness of their caresses. In such music of the theatre Mr. Monteux is conductor to thrill and to praise.

Next the Wagner, sun-lit and glamorous, gently pictorial, tenderly musing, through the undulant, whirring, dreamful music of the epitomized "Forest Scene" of "Siegfried," with the song of the bird upon it as in flash of tonal radiance and of sudden tension dramatic. Then the Wagner who in tones can narrate of heroes, visualizing, almost, in his measures the scene, the progress, the passion—the decanted music of Siegfried scaling the fire-girt rock, of Siegfried parting from the Valkyr—"zu neuen Thäten, theure Helde"—of Siegfried breasting the wide-waved Rhine in the deepening, far-spread dawn. Upon this Wagner, master of tonal landscape, and tonal movement, spacious, exalted, epic, Mr. Monteux, of his own notion, elected to pile the final pages of "Götterdämmerung," when the orchestra, save for a single chior, rests in tumult and clamor upon earth; while that choir—the violins—mounts heavenward. Perhaps this sudden "apotheosis" smacked of the theatre of spectacle rather than the theatre of music-drama. None the less Mr. Monteux is fast mastering the broad unbroken, ever moving lines, the advancing, the receding surge, ever persistent, that in orchestral performance is the beauty, power and life of the Wagnerian word.

RIMSKY - KORSAKOV'S Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade." glowing with the colors. the rhythms and fantasy of an Orient of The Arabian Nights., displayful of the orchestra as well, is the piece with which Mr. Monteux will next Friday and Saturday end the Symphony Concerts for the year. An entr'acte of mixed matter, now gentle, now sonorous, from Chabrier's Viking opera, "Gwendoline"; a suite of eighteenth-century dances from Grétry's opera, "Cephalus and Procris," rescored by Mottl; and Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama," for a composer of the hour, will fill the first half of the programme.

On Thursday evening, at the final concert of the current series in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will also be heard in Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade." The excerpts from Wagner's operas, played yesterday and today at Symphony Hall, fill the rest of the programme, viz.: The Introduction and Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser"; the epitomized Forest Scene from "Siegfried" and the measures from that music-drama and "Götterdämmerung" in which the hero climbs to Brünnhilde's fiery rock, farewells her and journeys down the Rhine to the Gibichungs' land. To all this Mr. Monteux has appended the final pages of the whole opera.

LAST SYMPHONY

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," will be the big number at the closing Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Shreker's "Prelude to a Drama," dance music from the Gretry Opera, "Cephalus and Procris," and the entr'acte from Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," are the other numbers.

PROGRAM FOR POP OPENING

The classic Pop Concerts will open at Symphony Hall on Monday, May 1. Agide Jacchia will for the sixth successive summer preside over the full-sized orchestra of seventy-five players, which in the last analysis is the true glory of the Pops.

Although every program offers a real musical treat, there is a leaven of encores and lighter numbers. Light refreshments are served. The program for the opening follows:

Procession of Bacchus	Delibes
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"	Mozart
Spanish Dance from "Panaderos"	Glazounoff
Fantasia, "Aida"	Verdi
"Hymn to the Sun" from "Iris"	Mascagni
Danza della Ondine ("Dance of the Waves") from "Loreley"	Catalani
Hindu Song	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture to "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Selection, "La Boutique Fantasue"	Rissini-Respighi
Waltz, "Roses from the South"	Strauss
Marche Slave	Tschaikowsky

POPS TO OPEN MAY 1

A week from tomorrow night in Symphony Hall the floor seats will be removed, tables installed and the famous and favored Pop Concerts will take complete possession of every night except Sunday.

The many aspects which have made the Pops popular of late seasons will be preserved and enlarged upon in this, the 37th season. Mr. Jacchia, the finest of Pop conductors, will for the sixth successive summer preside over the full-sized symphony orchestra of 75 players which in the last analysis is the true glory of the Pops. An operatic fantasia, overture, or ballet number, this former conductor of many distinguished opera companies leads as one who knows and loves. As for the waltzes, suites, rhapsodies and sugary entr'actes which embellish every Pops' program, it is authoritatively stated that no finer performance is to be heard anywhere. There is a leaven of encores and lighter numbers, even to operetta, to please the uninitiated. Any suggestion of seriousness is dispelled by the food, drink and conversation which, according to the time-tried manner of the Pops, flow easily, even persistently, without obtruding upon aural pleasures.

On Tuesday night of the first week Wellesley will celebrate with a group of songs by the Wellesley Glee Club. This night and every other is open to the public and is of particular public interest. Thursday night will bring a Russian program. The program for the opening night (May 1) follows:

Procession of Bacchus	Delibes
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"	Mozart
Spanish Dance from "Panaderos"	Glazounov
Fantasia, "Aida"	Verdi
"Hymn to the Sun" from "Iris"	Mascagni
Danza della Ondine (Dance of the Waves) from "Loreley"	Catalani
Hindu Song	Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner

HERALD - APR. 23

In the spring the fancy of the music lover, if it turns in any direction which concerns a concert hall, turns to "Pops." These "Pop" concerts open a week from tomorrow night in Symphony Hall. They have grown in popularity of late years, until it has been possible for the management to assemble an orchestra of Boston Symphony players of sufficient proportions to play any standard composition of symphonic music, let alone the waltzes, marches, paraphrases from popular operettas which are interspersed with the more serious music on the "Pop" programmes.

Fifty per cent of the "Pop" programmes is, in fact, far nearer the offerings of the regular Boston Symphony concerts of the winter season than is generally realized. The principal difference in the musical material is its length. Symphonies in four movements are eschewed, though it is quite often that one encounters a single movement of a celebrated symphony. But suites, Wagnerian excerpts, the shorter symphonic poems, compositions ranging from Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," played next Friday and Saturday afternoon at the last pair of subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony season, to the prelude of "Tristan and Isolde," are heard, and heard with the greatest attention, and in a silence almost unduly sepulchral, by those who crowd the balconies and tables, and eat, and drink, and listen to music.

That is the effect, perhaps unforeseen a few years ago, of the Pop concerts. They furnish an amazing amount per season of the best music, but in doing so they carefully gild the pill. An audience that notes with pleasure that Victor Herbert's "Americanesque" is to be heard, goes away having discovered greatly to its surprise an equal pleasure in the march movement of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique Symphony."

This is listening at its easiest and most pleasurable. There are long enough waits between the pieces to have a chat. There are refreshments if desired. Half the terror of a long concert is in the stiffness of the chairs and the long, long stretches of music and the very brief opportunity to take a breath in between before proceeding farther. People get stiff, mentally. At the Pop concerts one sits at ease and follows the music or not, as one pleases.

It would be an excellent thing if all American artistic enterprises could provide equally painless pleasure, and lose the alarming aspect that they often present to the great public. There is a way to interest everyone in good music, to make this music irresistibly appealing to a man, whether he is informed on the subject or not. It is not necessary for him to be learned in the tonal art to feel the inspiration of great masters. These are most important facts, which the Pop concerts, for everybody's benefit, are discovering.

LAST SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite "Scherezade" will be the last number on the 24th regular program of Symphony concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This concert will close the Symphony season. Mr. Monteux will repeat Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama." The other numbers will be a suite of dances arranged by Mottl, from Gretry's "Cephalus and Procris"; also the entr'acte from Chabrier's "Gwendoline."

POST - APR 23.

On the programme for the final concert of the season by the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge tomorrow evening stand from Wagner, not the numbers played at Symphony Hall last week, but these pieces: Introduction to Act III., Apprentices' Dance, Homage to Sachs from "Die Meistersinger"; Forest Scene from "Siegfried" the Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung"; and The Valkyrs' Ride from "Die Walküre." Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" will begin the concert.

Some have said mistakenly that Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama," to be repeated at the Symphony Concerts of this week, was also the Prelude to his opera, "Die Gezeichneten," or "The Branded." As it happens, however, only a few introductory measures actually lift the curtain in the theatre. Yet the "Prelude to a Drama" does contain a Prelude originally designed for "Die Gezeichneten," along with an Entr'acte and a Scene of Procession from the opera. When Schreker so assembled the symphonic piece the production of the music-drama seemed unlikely.

Musical News and Reviews

Final Boston Symphony Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-fourth concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was:

Grétry-Mottl
Three Dances from "Céphale et Procris"
Chabrier....Entr' acte from "Gwendoline"
Schreker............"Prelude to a Drama"
Rimsky-Korsakoff ...."Scheherazade"

This final program, to be repeated this evening, brings the present season's Symphony concerts to a close, a season which has been remarkably brilliant, both as regards the playing and progress of the orchestra and for the variety and interest of its programs. Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic Suite is always welcome, always effective, and always grateful to both conductor and orchestra. Mr. Monteux's reading of it was poetic, well balanced, and imaginative. Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama," given its first American performance here earlier in the season, did not cause a change of opinion on a second hearing. It betrays the defects and qualities of the modern German school, is not without interest, yet suffers from undue prolixity and an orchestration often unwieldy to the point of clumsiness. The pieces by Chabrier and Ghétry served to round out one of the most enjoyable and pleasing programs of the season.

The audience, by long-continued and hearty applause at his entrance, testified to its appreciation of Mr. Monteux's artistic endeavors during the past year. This token of esteem was well deserved. Few conductors could have brought the orchestra through the trials and tribulations of the past to the state of perfection to which it has now attained. The choice of programs has been beyond criticism. It is impossible to mention one which has not contained at least one composition of novel interest. This by no means is intended to imply that such music has been played solely for its novelty. All the unfamiliar pieces have been selected with care and a due consideration for their musical worth. Mr. Monteux has also distinguished himself by his readings of the familiar classics. In the music of Beethoven particularly he has shown interpretative powers of a high order, never allowing purely personal readings to cloud the composer's evident intentions and yet giving to the music a life and sympathetic understanding as rare as it is remarkable. The orchestra has gained in perfection of ensemble, in variety of nuance and in beauty of tone. In short the artistic success of the season is unquestioned and that to come may be anticipated with the keenest pleasure. S. M.

Monday night, May 1, will be the opening night of the annual series of popular concerts, or "Pops" as they are more familiarly called, in Symphony Hall. Agide Jacchia will conduct, and he has provided for this opening concert a program of unusual interest.

Schreker Tells Why He Called It a "Prelude"

The following translated letter throws light on the much-discussed title of Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama," repeated at this week's Symphony concerts:

Berlin-Charlottenburg
Hardenbergstr, 415
April 11, 1922

My dear Mr. Pierre Monteux:

From newspaper reports, I have learned of the brilliant performances which you have given in Boston and New York of my "Vorspiel zu einem Drama."

It made me very happy, and I cannot neglect to express to you my very great joy and heartfelt gratitude. This gratitude I beg you also to extend to the remarkable organization, such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is known to be.

I read in the very pleasing New York criticisms surprise at the title "Vorspiel," etc. Not without reason! This opus, which was written for the Vienna Philharmonic at a time when I was occupied with the score of "Die Gezeichneten," would better be named "Symphonic music on Themes from the Opera, 'Die Gezeichneten,'" or "Prelude, Entr'acte Music and Festive Procession from the opera 'Die Gezeichneten.'" For a prelude, it actually developed to too great length. Before the first performance of the entire opera, I did not want to unmask myself with this previously performed prelude.

Dear Mr. Monteux, I regret not having been able to hear any of your performances. Should fate, however, at some time bring me to America, I shall not miss visiting you in Boston.

AGAIN THE POPS

A New Series of the Familiar Concerts to Begin on Monday Under the Usual Conditions—Mr. Jacchia for Conductor and Programme-Maker

FOR a thirty-seventh spring and summer, the Pop Concerts will begin on Monday at Symphony Hall to continue there, every evening except Sunday, well into July. Once more the floor will be cleared of rows of seats, and tables and chairs will replace them. Again it will be possible to eat at them, to drink at them—whatever the law allows; to smoke at them unmolested. Furthermore, for those who prefer liquid refreshment apart from music, a bar—as bars go nowadays—stands as heretofore at the back of the first balcony. Food and drink at The Pops have long been of the best, and this spring there will be no departure from standard. According to custom also, the two balconies will be reserved for those who would take the pleasure of the music as at any other concert. The Symphony Orchestra, seventy or eighty strong, as need may require, will provide that music; while again Mr. Jacchia returns to lead it. By this time his tireless energy with band and music, his zest for instrumental melody, his fire of rhythm, his communicating verve are an old story. Orchestra and audience alike answer nightly to him.

As in the past, the conductor will make more various and interesting programmes than have any of his predecessors. Operatic overtures, waltzes and marches, occasional vivid fragments from symphonies, frequent fantasias from familiar operas, solo-pieces, miniatures, ballet music and a generally pleasing miscellany will all figure upon them. Thus the list for Monday includes a Suite of Dances from Respighi's ballet (after Rossini) "La Boutique Fantasque"; the list for Tuesday a Fantasia from "Lohengrin" and Goldmark's Overture, "Sakuntala"; the list for Wednesday, fragments of Massenet's opera, "The Juggler of Notre Dame" and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; the list for Thursday, a variety of pieces by Russian composers, even to Skriabin and Musorgsky. On Friday, the Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" will be heard; while Saturday evening brings the usual light miscellany. According to custom the Transcript will print each day the programme of the evening.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

RITES, TABLES AND ANOTHER YEAR ENDED

Mr. Monteux in Warm Leave-Taking—The Programmes That Once More Praise Him—The Qualities of the Orchestra That He Steadily Betters—Fresh Proof Through the Pieces of Yesterday—Schreker's "Prelude" Clearer and More Individualized

WITH minor variations the usual rites of leave-taking accompanied yesterday the final matinée, for the season, of the Symphony Orchestra. With minor variations also the usual tables, epitomizing the year of conductor and band, filled many pages of the programme-book. From a company that seemed to fill every seat, the rites began when Mr. Monteux first came to his place. Every Friday afternoon his coming has brought a ripple of applause; yesterday it was a wave flowing from auditorium to stage. The first part of the concert ended with Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama," novel piece repeated from first performance in February. Whatever the merit, the music is not such as to stir an audience and, when it was done, the conductor was recalled with no more than customary warmth. Next, for final number, ensued Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade"—familiar, well-liked, instant and displayful music sure to work upon the sensibilities of an audience. At each pause, the plaudits became heartier. At the end, they recalled Mr. Monteux once and twice and findly brought the orchestra to its feet in crescent around him. The clapping rose, fell, stilled from the standing audience. Yet had it been silent, it would have paid no mean tribute to both. For nearly five minutes it had delayed departure which, on Friday afternoons, is usually speedy.

The tables of the programme-book, for their part, justified the applauded conductor. Through the twenty-four concerts of the "subscription series" he assembled, with the coöperating "soloists," no less than 104 numbers. Fifty-five composers wrote them—classic, modern, of our own day; German, French, Russian, Italian, American, Czech, Spanish, Pole, Finn—in the widest range of time, school, nationality. Six of these pieces were played for the first times anywhere; five for the first times in America; thirteen for the first times in Boston; sixteen for the first times "at these concerts." So does Mr. Monteux keep himself perpetually open-minded, as eager for old music neglected as for new music deserving to be heard. So are his programmes ever fresh and catholic. As evenly he holds his choice in balance. Steadfastly he plays the classics—but not until repetition has dulled them into routine or hardened them into monopoly. Alike with the ancients and the moderns, he is no less zealous for the overlooked, than the established, piece. With the composers of our day, he would diffuse information and individual quality, pursuing no cults.

By such faiths and works, year by year does Mr. Monteux excel all his recent predecessors in the range, the stimulation and the sustained quality of his programmes. Thus, from past October through present April, he has made known to Symphony Hall pieces to be remembered, like Mr. Loeffler's "Irish Fantasias"; Mr. Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions"; de Falla's Spanish dances out of "The Three-Cornered Hat"; Schreker's Prelude aforesaid; with all its faults, Szymanovski's Second Symphony; Sibelius's Fifth, sure to be repeated next season; Casella's ballet-music from "The Convent by the Water"; Schönberg's "Transfiguring Night." Notable revivals he has also accomplished—Strauss's "Don Quixote"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Night on Mount Triglav"; Liszt's "Dance of Death" and the Dante Symphony; Concertos of Handel; a Brandenburg Concerto of Bach. So forth and so onward through a succession of pieces, "standard" or "novel," that hardly an orchestra in America, and certainly none in Europe, may match through six months of a hundred-odd concerts. With reason does Mr. Monteux let his works praise him.

In like wisdom and zeal, to equally laudable outcome, Mr. Monteux has schooled, ripened, sensitized an orchestra that no more than two years ago was reconstituted at his hands. Being an assemblage of a hundred human beings, led also by a human being, playing, furthermore, to human beings, the quality of its accomplishment varies. Like the conductor, it excels in keenly rhythmed, highly colored, warmly expressive, vividly pictorial, full-bodied or sharp-set music. Pieces of the theatre, pieces that characterize modernwise, pieces that, so to say, can be visualized upon the imagination, warm both to large or fine achievement. To the fuller-voiced classics that time hardly alters—to Concertos of Bach or Handel, to Symphonies of Beethoven or Brahms—they bring in due kind and measure hardly less communicating and transfiguring voice. They fall short chiefly in music that exacts an exceeding fineness of texture and suppleness of movement, wherein tonal verve must serve tonal plasticity. Even there, as recent instances of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, have proved, there is progress.

In individual quality, certainly, the players in the Symphony Orchestra now bear comparison with the players in any similar body the world around. The shimmer, the warmth, the balance, the euphony of the string choir, speak almost weekly for themselves. The choir of wood-winds is not only an assemblage of virtuosi, but of virtuosi ambitious also to be pliant, sensitive ensemble. A horn or two may leave something to be desired; but there is no doubting the range of the brass from mellowness to splendor or the skill—from Mr. Neumann downwards—of the player upon those instruments which modern composers smite so often, variously and singu larly. Collectively, new virtue and old no praise the orchestra; while at the seam that are still loose or the edges not yet quit sewed, conductor and men steadily work It is good to hear the band so balanced so sensitized, so become manifold and responsive instrument again. It is better to hear it—and Mr. Monteux—still unsatisfied, still forward with ambition.

It was possible to find the programme o yesterday designed in particular to traverse the quality of what is really a nev Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux's list contained not one of the sanctified "pieces of farewell," like the Prelu to "Die Meistersinger." It was no a semblage of hallowed classics or sonoro moderns—Beethoven or Brahms. Wagn or Strauss. Through the first part, it co tained neither "standard" nor "sure-fir number, seemed, indeed, a rather ha hazard miscellany of pieces that the co ductor wished, for one reason or anothe to play before the season was done—thre Dances from Grétry's eighteenth-centur ballet, "Cephalus and Procris"; the In troduction to the Second Act of Chabrier music-drama, "Gwendoline"; the "Prelud to a Drama" of the newly risen Austrian Schreker. Presumably the second par Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," re stored the proper balance for leave-taking Intrinsic and enduring quality praises it a familiar public takes pleasure in it Mr. Monteux, repeating it a hundred time in the days when it was ballet-music t Dyaghilev's miming Russians, excels in it on its mettle, individually and collectively the orchestra goes to it. There are over serious listeners who count "Scheherazade" almost a frivolous, certainly a superficial piece beside "great works" of "absolute" music. Sundry "serious musicians" and reviewers in Europe are puzzled over the vogue of it in America—one more proof, they say, of our thin musical soil. Yet, be it remembered, "Scheherazade" seems exactly to fulfill Rimsky's design, which he could choose of his own free will; while in the fulfillment beauty and power, artifice and artistry go hand in hand with imagination into diverse and sustained illusion. It is the European, not the American ear that fails to hear.

So it was that the light, bright rhythm, of which the whole orchestra is now capable, played over Grétry's Tambourin and Gigue, not too sophisticated by the "freely editing" Mottl, while as sensitive and supple was the band to every turn in the shaded or evened progress. In particular out of these dances shone the suave shimmer, the precise, yet pliant, elegance of the strings. In the Minuet, with wistful melody almost caressed into period and modulation, came the turn of the perfect phrasing, the linked measures, the transparent, iridescent tone of the wood-winds. Adept with ballet-music from Gluck and Grétry even to Stravinsky and de Falla remains Mr. Monteux. The fragment from "Gwendoline" mingles a darksome and ominous music with a music longing, anticipating, ecstatic. To both Chabrier, with Wagner ever in his ears, would give heroic voice. He succeeds when the bodement sounds as fateful, the desire as deep as Mr. Monteux and the orchestra carried them. The darker instruments abounded in sombre color; the intensity of Chabrier's more characteristic measures burned white; ever the large, long lines of this interwoven preluding stood clear.

With "Scheherazade," of course, came the virtuosi's day—Mr. Burgin at the violin of the story-teller; Mr. Laus at the bassoon of the Kalendar-Prince; Mr. Laurent, Mr. Longy and Mr. Sand variously at flute, oboe and clarinet; the gentleman of the percussion corner, tapping and titillating the prattle of young prince and young princess "when they sat in the garden and spoke of love." More, however, out of the whole orchestra in play upon the music, shone the vividness of rhythm, the range of color, the songful warmth, the mingled fluidity and p the sensuous beauty, the delineati gestion to which Mr. Monteux has the band. Insistent upon all this Rimsky-Korsakov in the Elysian may have beamed through his spectacles upon conductor and ready even to exceed him.

For more reasons than Mr. Monte interest in Schreker and sense of his serts, the "Prelude to a Drama" wa ranted to repetition. The piece is no easy to grasp at a single or a double hear ing; it is work of a debated and ligh placed German composer in the generatio now succeeding Strauss; it is example German music written and first heard be hind the veils of the late war; it stirre the curiosity of not a few frequenters o Symphony Hall. In measure Schreker note to Mr. Monteux, elsewhere printed i these columns, clarifies the design of th Prelude or rather transforms it into "Prelude, Entr'acte and Festival-Proce sion" from his opera, "Die Gezeichneten or "The Branded." Even so, the drama tizing purport of the music still evade the imagination in the concert-hall. T festal pages are clear enough—of sinist and boding rather than joyous or lightso pageant. From time to time, an intensi almost acrid, pervades the music, but w may say what this fierce passion may or whither it leads. There are up-swe ing, flaming climaxes, measures as well still, sombre brooding—music obviously drama, yet of drama to which there is clew.

Heard in intrinsic self, berated tho it has been from the Danube to the Rh and thence across Western Europe, Prelude yet keeps clear individuality. occasional climaxes in the manner Strauss sonorous, plangent and ma keyed; the occasional melody sensuous emphatic in ascending phrase and bea rhythm à la Puccini are but the accide the instincts, of any well-read ope composer writing in Central Europ these years. Agreed, too, that Shre often distributes harmonies and tim thickly; that by excess alike in means expression, he sometimes turns his m turgid. None the less this Prelude in a curiously insistent motion; the m ures seem in incessant undulation; periods like a whirlpool, even turning themselves, ever casting up some new mood, passion. Everywhere, too, Schr writes in hot intensity of spirit. His m ures of brooding murmur remote, i spective; his measures of passionate ody burn red and almost savage; festival clangs and jangles; the en less resignation than passion exhau by its own fierceness. Consider th traits; consider the incessant swirl tumult of the Prelude; and it is as tho Schreker would snare in tones a welter gods and men.

Good Work, Good Will

A Letter from Franz Schreker, Austrian Composer of a "Prelude to a Drama," to Pierre Monteux, French Conductor, Who First Played the Piece in Boston and New York—1922.

POPS OPEN TOMORROW

The most important date in the spring is that which launches "The Pops" at Symphony Hall. The huge demand for tables and balcony seats for the opening night, which takes place tomorrow, indicates that the inauguration of this, the 37th season, will be an event of magnitude. Symphony Hall is even now busy with preparations. The tables, the bar, the cuisine, the decorations, etc., are being installed, while waitresses—swift and silent—are responding to the call.

Under the zealous and distinguished leadership of Agide Jacchia, the Pops have in recent seasons risen to the highest popularity. With a full-sized symphony orchestra of finely skilled musicians, and with diversified programs the Pops promise to reach new records in their mission of delighting thousands.

The first week brings the annual Wellesley night, on Tuesday, May 2, with numbers to be sung by the college glee club, while Thursday night, May 4, will bring a Russian program. All nights, of course, are open to the public. The first six programs follow:

SYMPHONY CONCERT

When Mr. Monteux came on the stage at the beginning of the last concert of the present season yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, the audience applauded him to the echo before they would allow him to open the concert.

The program was as follows: Three dances from "Cephale et Procris," Gretry-Mottl; entr'acte from "Gwendoline," Chabrier; prelude to a drama, Schreker; the last symphonic suite "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The three dance numbers were delightfully done. They were entirely charming in the interpretation that the conductor gave them.

The Chabrier entr'acte from "Gwendoline" was given a better reading on this occasion than can be remembered in a long time.

POPS START MONDAY

No event in the Spring is half so important as the opening night of the Pops, which will take place next Monday, May 1, in Symphony Hall. Extending from that time into the early Summer, the Pops will be heard every night, except Sunday. Judging by the huge demand for seats for the opening night, the thirty-seventh season of the Pops is to have an auspicious beginning such as was never known before.

The first week brings the annual Wellesley Night, on Tuesday, May 2, with numbers to be sung by the college glee club, while Thursday night, May 4, will bring a Russian program. All nights, of course, are open to the public. The opening program follows:

24TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Fine Qualities of Players Shown in Dance Pieces by Gretry

41ST SEASON TO CLOSE TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

24th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Gretry, three dance pieces, freely arranged by Mottl, from "Cephalus and Procris"; Chabrier, introduction to Act II of "Gwendoline"; Schreker, Prelude to a Drama; Rimsky-Korsakov, "Scheherazade."

Gretry's music was known in Boston as early as 1795, when he was described on a program as "the celebrated Gretry"; but this charming suite of dance tunes from one of his operas had not been heard at these concerts since 1908. It was high time to revive it. Unfortunately the orchestral score of the opera is not in the Public Library, and it is not easy to imagine how the dances would sound if played in the original form. Gretry wrote entertainingly about the opera in his "Essais," delightful volumes abounding in simple and shrewd reflections on his wit and on life and manners. He tells us how he thought of cutting out the character Aurore; for "men when they are assembled do not like to see a woman disdained"; all he has to say about the instrumentation is this: "One will see in the course of this work how contemporaneous music, the noisy music that may be called 'revolutionary,' is far from that which suits the French character; an indisputable proof that in every country music follows the manners"; but in this article he also says, "All the Italian geniuses have not been able to produce an overture like Gluck's to 'Iphigenia in Aulis.'" We know from some of Gretry's operas that his orchestration was weak, but it fitted his stage. It has been well said that sonorous combinations, powerful orchestral effects are prejudicial to a composer of fine and clever musical thoughts. Yet Gretry introduced the organ in one of his operas; in the "Fausse Magie" he wrote a gypsy march, "accompanied by cymbals, triangles and other singular instruments" (according to his manuscript), and in his "William Tell" he used a bass drum, side drum and cymbals. It has been suggested that an interesting and useful article could be based on this subject: "The instrumentation of composers who did not know how to write."

No doubt, then, Mottl added by his discreet and effective instrumentation to the old-world fascination of these dances, but the simplicity and the melodic charm of Gretry are still to be recognized and appreciated. How beautifully the minuet was displayed! The performance of it tested delicacy and grace. The orchestral triumph was here as pronounced as was its triumph with the music of Schreker and Rimsky-Korsakov. The test was also as great, in some respects greater.

We have written at length concerning this selection because the performance of this Minuet revealed fully the taste of the conductor and the fine qualities of the players.

Some have said, and will reason, that Schreker's music is too long a Prelude for any drama, even Mr. Shaw's "Back to Methuselah," or any favorite Chinese play. It apepars from a letter written by the composer to Mr. Monteux—it was received too late for insertion in the Program Book—that this Prelude is really composed of an introduction, an Entr'acte or two and a Festal Procession from his opera "Die Gezeichneten." As the Prelude was brought out in Vienna in 1914, and the opera was not performed until 1918 at Frankfort, he was unwilling in 1914 by a title to anticipate the operatic performance. The Prelude was heard here earlier in the season. It gains perhaps from a better understanding of its contents, yet a second hearing deepens the impression that while there are both emotional pages—few in number—and more that are brilliant, the work as a whole is over-orchestrated, without many arresting musical ideas, without sufficiently contrasting episodes. The suggestions of Puccini and Strauss should not vex one. It is what Schreker himself has to say that seems thickly expressed and too often hardly worth the saying in spite of pompous, boisterous rhetoric.

It is always a pleasure to hear the Entr'acte from "Gwendoline," beautiful music, truly emotional, music that came from the heart, not merely the brain of an irregular genius.

The performance of "Scheherazade" was extremely brilliant. Every time we hear this gorgeously colored music, that one might say is reeking with perfumes of the East, yet music that is of the sea asof the harem and the bazaar, we cannot help wondering which one of the three Kalandars Rimsky-Korsakov had in mind, and what the festival at Bagdad had to do with the ship that struck the magnetic mountain. Will "Scheherazade" outlive Rimsky's "Antar"? The former is now more popular; the latter seems to us, while the orchestration is not so dazzling, the nobler composition. But it is foolish to indulge in prophecy concerning the life of this or that work which now seems to have essential qualities.

The concert will be repeated tonight, and with it the 41st season of the orchestra will end.

Concerning this season, one of the most memorable in the history of the orchestra, The Herald will publish a few remarks tomorrow.

Pop Concerts Begin at Symphony Hall

The Pop concerts at Symphony Hall begin tomorrow night with orchestra, conductor, refreshments and all arrangements essentially the same as in past seasons. These concerts, which offer programs chosen by experience of what orchestral pieces their audience cares for, are a Boston institution of almost 40 years standing. Attempts to duplicate them in other American cities have so far failed.

Every night this week there will be an attractive program, chosen by Agide Jacchia, the conductor, out of his five years' successful experience as leader. Tuesday is Wellesley night, open to the public. Thursday there is a program representative of leading Russian composers, including a number of Skriabin as well as the expected Tschaikowsky. The opening program brings the first Boston performance of two interesting novelties, excerpts from the new Rossini-Respighi ballet, "La Boutique Fantasque," and a "Dance of the Waves," from Catalini's opera, "Loreley."

The program for tomorrow is as follows: "Procession of Bacchus," Delibes; overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Spanish dance from "Panaderos," Glazounoff; fantasia, "Aida," Verdi; "Hymn to the Sun," from "Iris," Mascagni; "Dance of the Waves," from "Loreley," Catalini; "Hindu Song," Rimsky-Korsakoff, overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; selection, "La Boutique Fantasque," Rossini-Respighi; waltz, "Roses from the South," Strauss; "Marche Slave," Tschaikowsky.

GLOBE = APR. 30

Boston will tomorrow welcome "the Pops," which bless the warmth of every Spring in that city and continue nightly, except Sundays, till early Summer. The Pop Concerts, as The Herald says, are very much a part of history; they are also Boston's own, for envy and emulation in other cities have never led to permanent results. The present, at any rate, will be the thirty-seventh season of the Symphony Orchestra's lighter activities, and the third year under Volstead. For the fifth time, Agide Jacchia is conductor and will lead the seventy-five men in his arrangements of "Eili, Eili," "Dubinushka" and "Volga Boatmen's Song."

"Pops programs have delights for all; they are made the more palatable by the sociable gayety that pervades the Pops, and by the refreshments that freely circulate at the tables and over the bar (now to be regarded as a permanent feature of the Pops). Virtually all of the societies, clubs, colleges, schools and conventions that celebrated at the Pops last year are booked for this, together with many new ones. About 97 per cent. of all Pop nights, however, are open to the public."

TIMES APR 29

POP CONCERTS WILL BE OPENED TONIGHT

The 37th season of the famous pop concerts in Symphony Hall, which offers the unque combination of the finest symphony orchestra, the lightest music and the possibility of simultaneous refreshments and conversation, will open tonight. Agide Jacchia will present the following program:

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CLOSES SEASON TUESDAY

Next Tuesday evening, April 11 in Infantry Hall at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring to a close the present season in Providence.

Merle Alcock, who by virtue of her very successful appearances in many of our cities, including Providence, and likewise as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra elsewhere, is accounted one of the finest contraltos now on the concert stage will be the soloist with the orchestra on this occasion. She will sing three numbers of the early Italian master, Pergolese, and the well known aria, "Oh don Fatale" from Verdi's "Don Carlos."

In place of a symphony, Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert the romantic score, "Wallenstein" by Vincent d'Indy, which has taken its place as one of the finest achievements of the modern French school of music. This work was inspired by Schiller's Trilogy and d'Indy, like Schiller, has divided it into three parts, treating the career of the famous general of the Thirty Years' War as follows: 1. "Wallenstein's Camp; 2. "Max and Thekla, "The Piccolomini;" 3. "Death of Wallenstein."

Richard Wagner's Prelude to his great religious drama, "Parsifal" will also be played. Since this prelude contains all the essential themes of the great drama itself, it can be looked upon almost as a miniature version of "Parsifal." The predominant motifs are the long-drawn and celestial melody of the Last Supper and the empressive Holy Grail motif which utilizes the "Dresden Amen." Mr. Monteux will close this concert and the season with Liszt's "Les Preludes," the most pronounced favorite of his symphonic poems, and perhaps the most brilliant and impressive of them all.

The "younger set" of concert-goers is looking forward to the programme arranged for them at the young people's concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Ensemble next Tuesday afternoon at 4 o'clock in Elks Hall. This organization of a dozen or so players from the Boston Symphony is under the direction of Augusto Vannini, and composes what is in fact a miniature symphony orchestra.

The programme which was announced last week is made up of pieces that will appeal to the young and that are not too deep or involved for ready and clear interpretation and comment. Walter H. Butterfield, Providence's supervisor of music, will provide this feature of the programme. It is said that if there is sufficient interest shown in this concert, a series of similar appearances may be arranged next year. Though arranged especially for the young folk, grown-ups are invited to attend also.

Final of Symphony Concert Series

With the orchestra's inclusion of the prelude to "Parsifal," and Miss Alcock's three religious numbers by Pergolese, the final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall will have something of Lenten atmosphere about it. In addition to the selections from the 18th century Italian composer, Miss Alcock is to sing "O don fatale" from Verdi's "Don Carlos." The tonal beauty and dramatic intensity of her contralto voice have won for her high recognition on the concert stage wherever she has appeared, including visits to this city.

There is no symphony on the programme but in its place will be d'Indy's musical setting of Schiller's triology "Wallenstein," which Mr. Monteux will play probably for the first time in Providence. Like the other earlier works of the illustrious French composer, "Wallenstein" is translated with a certain romanticism, and this quality seems to go far in giving it so high and favored a place among the many fine scores which d'Indy has written. The music follows the career of the famous General of the Thirty Years War and, according to the scheme of Schiller, is divided into three parts. The middle section is an amorous interlude concerning the thwarted loves of Max and Thekla.

This concert and the season will close with Liszt's popular and impressively brilliant symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," said to describe the passage of Lamartine beginning, "What is our life but a series of preludes to that unknown song, the first solemn note of which is sounded by Death?"

Religious Atmosphere Reflected in Boston Symphony's Tuesday Programme.—Announcement of Choral Society's Appearance.

Appropriate to the deepening religious feeling and significance of to-day and the days to come are the special programmes in the churches. From a musical standpoint, also, selections have been made that are of particular interest.

As in the churches the religious atmosphere will be reflected in the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday night in addition to the purely musical attraction of the occasion. The latter element is foremost in the first public appearance here of the Boston Symphony players in their young people's concert Tuesday afternoon, and the Monte Civita Band of the Order of the Sons of Italy to-night. Another organization scheduled to make its first appeal to the public this month is the Choral Art Society.

The Monte Civita Band of the Order of the Sons of Italy which gives its first public concert in Fay's Theatre to-night, is an organization of 35 musicians who have been students of Vincenzo Masella for about three years. Some of the members are mere youngsters who have grown to proficiency in band music along with the more mature players, and will have solo numbers on the programme.

The period of training has been punctuated by many engagements at various private and semi-private functions, through which the organization has become well known and practiced in its art. Mr. Masella has arranged a programme of classic and "popular" music aimed to please all tastes.

SUPERB PROGRAM IS PRESENTED

Boston Symphony Orchestra Included Lenten Selections in Its List.

The fifth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given in Infantry Hall last evening before the usual large and responsive audience.

Merle Alcock, the gifted American contralto, who is recognized as one of the leading contraltos in oratorio on the concert stage, was the soloist and the program was rendered as follows:

"Wallenstein," Trilogy (after the dramatic poem of Schiller), Op. 12.....d'Indy
Wallenstein's Camp.
Max and Thekla.
The Death of Wallenstein.
Prelude to "Parsifal"..........Wagner
"Salve Regina," "Eia Ergo," "Et Jesum, Benedictum"..........Pergolesi
Aria, "O Don Fatale," from the opera, "Don Carlos"..........Verdi
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3 (after Lamartine)..........Liszt

This program was wisely chosen by Mr. Monteux for, as will be seen at a glance, much of it was of a religious character, particularly appropriate to Holy Week, especially the "Prelude to Pasifal," Wagner's religious drama, featuring the "Good Friday Spell," which is a part of the prelude.

Miss Alcock also sang with the orchestra three religious numbers by Pergolesi, the early Italian composer, as well as a familiar aria.

The program opened with Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein" based on the three dramatic poems of Schiller. This magnificent work by the gifted living French composer had never before been played in Providence and it createde so profound an impression that a storm of applause came at its close to which Mr. Monteux bowed his acknowledgements.

The work is one of the very finest by this famous exponent of the modern French school, and it was given a magnificent reading by Mr. Munteux, notably in the second and third movements, both of which abound in exquisite effects of orchestration and melodic beauty.

Wagner's transcendently beautiful "Prelude to Parsifal," stirred the audience profoundly with the majesty with which it was interpreted by the orchestra— and the absolute stillness of the audience throughout this number evidenced the deep feeling that it aroused.

In the sacred vocal gems which followed, Mme. Alcock's beautiful voice rose rich and stron gand full above the orchestra. The "Salve Regina" especially was sung impressively and with a depth of feeling compelling in its intensity.

In the Verdi aria, "O Don Fatale," th econtralto rose to even greater vocal heights and a wave of prolonged applause came at the end when the singer was recalled several times. The concert closed with the brilliant Liszt prelude, superbly played by the orchestra and followed by an ovation by the audience.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Pierre Monteux is Conductor in Final Concert at Infantry Hall.

MERLE ALCOCK IS SOLOIST

D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy is Novelty of Programme.—Contralto Pleases in Pergolesi Airs and Aria from "Don Carlos"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, concluded its Providence season last evening at Infantry Hall with a brilliant programme in which Merle Alcock, contralto, assisted as soloist. Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, inspired by Schiller's poem, occupied the place of honor on the programme. Wagner and Liszt were the other composers represented by orchestral numbers. Although the orchestra has shown a finer degree of technical finished at some of its earlier appearances here this season, last evening's performance equalled in interest any of the present series. This was due to the presence of the d'Indy work on the programme and the singing of Mme. Alcock whose vocal gifts, artistic ability and personality took her audience by storm.

M. Monteux, as usual, conducted with authority and raised the performance to artistic heights on several occasions, notably in the second and third parts of the "Wallenstein" and in the final Liszt "Les Preludes."

This was the programme:

"Wallenstein," Trilogy (after the dramatic poem of Schiller), Op. 12.............d'Indy
Wallenstein's Camp.
Max and Thekla.
The Death of Wallenstein.
Prelude to "Parsifal"..................Wagner
"Salve Regina," "Eia Ergo," "Et Jesum, Benedictum" ....Pergolesi
Aria, "O Don Fatale," from the opera, "Don Carlos"......................Verdi
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3 (after Lamartine) ....Liszt

All great orchestral works must of necessity be the fruit of an inspiration of one kind or another. The composer staring hard at his ideal, writes his musical poetry or prose with all the resources that imagination and technical mastery place at his command. In the Wallenstein "Trilogy," d'Indy has painted in a highly individual and colorful style the scenes of Schiller's dramatic poem. It is doubtful, however, if he labored to give such detailed musical description of the text as some enthusiastic students of the score would have us believe. In the first movement, which is supposed to represent Wallenstein's camp, one hears a forceful and striking portrayal of the tumult and general atmosphere of such a place. There are clever hints, in melodic touch, rythm and in the use of various instrumental qualities, of the hurly-burly of a military camp.

In fact, such a movement is nothing more than a powerful stimulant to the hearer's imagination. Possessing one of a lively nature there is scarcely any limit one may set to the wedding of music and text. The first movement is musically less interesting than the second and third, for in the latter the composer enters the domain of the emotions in the portrayal of which he speaks a beautiful language. It was in the final movement, "The Death of Wallenstein," that the orchestra rose to the heights of dramatic expression. Enthusiastic applause greeted the conductor and players at its conclusion.

The solemn and impressive style of the "Parsifal" Prelude was maintained throughout its length. In this the brass choir has splendid opportunities and for the most part they were effectively met. Faulty tone on the part of one or two players were fleeting reminders of the presence of the human element even in the best of orchestras.

Mme. Alcock, who is a favorite here, received a fine welcome as she made her appearance. In the Pergolesi airs she was supported by a string orchestra and her work brought her deserved recognition. Her voice is more incisive than on former appearances here and she has the repose and vocal command of the seasoned artist. Her high notes ring out with fine quality and are made very telling when climaxes are needed.

The Verdi area, as might be expected, showed her voice to still greater advantage. She sang this number with an intensity and expression that thrilled her hearers. Her voice easily carried over full accompaniment, especially when brilliant top notes were in order. She was given an ovation at the conclusion of this number and was obliged to return several times in acknowledgment.

The Liszt "Preludes" present the composer in his most favorable light—that of brilliant and scoring and powerful climaxes. It was finely played and both conductor and men were held by applause for a few moments before they were allowed to go.

A. F. P.

Mr. Monteux concluded last night a notable symphony season. At last the Boston Symphony Orchestra, barring some "dead wood" among the players which should be exchanged for new material, is approximately at its old high level of virtuosity and euphony.

Mr. Monteux has shown what it is to be a thorough musician, irrespective of nationality. It is of interest, for example, to realize that this season compositions by 17 German and Austrian composers have been played, and, furthermore, that three composers of former enemy countries have had the lions' share of the programme. France has been represented by 11 composers, Russia by eight, America by seven, Italy by three, Spain by two, Belgium by two, in addition to which have been heard compositions by the Pole, Szymanowski; the Bohemian, Smetana; the Finn, Sibelius. These figures, in themselves, speak for the extraordinary catholicity of Mr. Monteux's tastes and appreciations.

Of the novelties performed the six which linger strongest in the memory are for us the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius; the Irish songs composed by Charles Martin Loeffler for John McCormack; the suite from the Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant of Henry Gilbert; the symphony of Mr. Szymanowski; the suite, "Couvent sur l'eau," of Casella, the the "Oriental Impressions" of Henry Eichheim. Sibelius' symphony showed clearly that he remains a man of extremely simple and powerful ideas, of fearless originality and masterly workmanship. The continually nearer approach to simplicity and economy of material in Sibelius' compositions is something that younger composers could study with profit. Mr. Loeffler's compositions appeared as an example of the manner in which a cultured modern composer, with a strong poetic and dramatic sense, may turn folk melody to advantage in original composition. They represented a new and very vital departure on the part of Mr. Loeffler, and will surely be counted among his finest works. Mr. Gilbert composed music for a pageant of highly picturesque and idealistic character. The thought of the beginnings of America stirred him. He responded in spirit and with true inspiration to an occasion which would have dampened the ardor of many of us, who cannot separate the conception of a pageant from the conception of writing music for a cowlot and a brass band.

The music had virility, directness and bold imaginative sweep. Mr. Szymanowski's symphony had some of the painstaking, some of the arduous fighting with detail, which a young man's symphony is likely to have. On the other hand, it has been seldom that we have heard a young composer in late years show such seriousness of spirit and so true a grasp of the spirit of the symphonic form.

The suite of Casella is wonderful for its color, its evocation of a past period. There is a richness of coloring, a sensation of old brocades, tragedies within forbidding walls, mysteries that are far off, unhappy, and beautiful, in music which is decorative, rather than dramatic. And Mr. Eichheim's oriental impressions are examples of a most exceptional sensitiveness of ear, mystery of instrumental color, and absorption of oriental mood. Of other novelties one could speak in detail but these are the salient ones. The season was one to be remembered in the annals of the orchestra for both things: excellence in the performances, and interesting and well balanced programmes.

POPS OPEN TOMORROW

The most important musical date in the spring is that which launches "The Pops" at Symphony Hall. The demand for tables and balcony seats for the opening night, which takes place tomorrow, May 1, is an indication of exceptional interest in this event on the part of the public.

Symphony Hall is even now busy with preparations. The tables, the bar, the cuisine, the decorations, etc. are being installed.

Under the leadership of Agide Jacchia the Pops have in recent seasons consistently gained in popularity, with a full-sized orchestra of musicians from the Boston Symphony. The whole wonderful literature of instrumental music is at Mr. Jacchia's command.

The first week brings the annual Wellesley night, on Tuesday, May 2, with numbers to be sung by the College Glee Club, while Thursday night, May 4, will bring a Russian programme. All nights, of course, are open to the public. The first programme follows:

MONDAY, MAY 1.

LIKE the audience of Friday afternoon, the audience of Saturday evening reserved its plaudits for Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra until the end of the concert. Applause heartier than usual welcomed the conductor to his stand; the three dances from Grétry's eighteenth-century ballet, "Cephalus and Procris," pleased the listeners in themselves and in the light, deft voice of the band; but neither the Introduction to the Second Act of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," nor the Symphonic Fragments of Schreker's music-drama, "Die Gezeichneten," is a piece to stir much clapping. Even the divisions of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade"—and in vivid performance—roused no more than usual response. As by a common impulse, the audience seemed minded to defer every rite of leave-taking to the end. Then they befell—genuine, hearty, unmistakable. None left the hall in haste; instead, everyone lingered, everyone rose and everyone applauded. Twice and thrice Mr. Monteux departed and returned; for long, as such things go, the standing orchestra (as it deserved) shared with him these rewards. Neither may doubt the pleasure of the public in the concerts of the year now ended; the good-will that it bears to the givers thereof; the anticipation with which it looks forward to the season to come. There is proof as clear, if more material, in the renewal of subscriptions at the box-office. Whatever its present fortunes in New York for ten weeks, in Boston for thirty, the new Symphony Orchestra is established.

Symphony First Pop Is Big Hit

"Pops" returned to Symphony hall last night, to the accompaniment of tinkling glasses, curling cigarette and cigar smoke and the music of Agide Jacchia's 75 symphony players. An audience which completely filled both galleries and occupied the chairs at almost every table on the floor enjoyed a program well designed to meet the none too exacting requirement of old friends renewing familiarity with an old pleasure.

The selections were well chosen to display the abilities of Mr. Jacchia's accomplished band, and though at times it seemed as if the social atmosphere as an attraction was almost overbalancing interest in the music, there was, nevertheless, an enthusiastic response after each offering and a distinguishing appreciation of the more brilliantly and artistically played of the pieces offered.

The concert opened with Delibe's "Procession of Bacchus." To this piece Mr. Jacchia's players brought grace and symmetry, in parts a freedom approaching the passionate abandon inscribed by the composer. Particularly in the lighter passages there was an attempt at discerning interpretation and an evidence of sympathy which was quite successful.

The performance was marred somewhat by the restlessness of a but recently seated audience, and the revival of old amenities. These in the galleries evidently had come to hear the music, and probably appreciated the beauty of the rendition more. Yet the license, the sociability of the floor, is undoubtedly the most unique charm of the "Pops."

In the Fantasia from "Aida," Verdi, and the overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner, the symphonists exhibited technical accuracy and precision which are by far the most essential elements of a satisfactory rendition of these two stirring selections. In the Dance of the Waves from "Loreley," Catalani, the players injected light and shade, rise and fall, roaring strength held in reserve, breaking out now and then, contrasting impressively with the general restraint.

With "Whispering of the Flowers," Blon, the power of the director was first palpably felt. Here was delicacy of treatment, tender tranquility, a felicitous illusion. Aeolus sighed through the strings, and murmured his gentle messages of loves to the sprouting blades and ardent shoots.

But with the Hindu Song by Rimsky-Korsakov, came the climax of the evening. The audience was transported, and left tumblers and saucers neglected on the tables. With the memory of the Boston Symphony's offering of the whole "Sherherazade" still fresh, comparison was natural, and not uncomplimentary. The oboe wailed its melancholy lament. The strings trickled and trinkled their joyous mockery. Brass lent body and the trumpet rang bravely. The waters of the Tiber and the Ganges licked at the marble steps of Buddhist temples, and Boston music-lovers bowed in admiration before this tribute to an alien pontiff.

With the "Marche Slave" Tchaikowsky's delineation of the awakening consciousness of a slumbering nation, the concert came to a fitting close. The softening echo of wood, remaining through the impression of deep-sounding brass was just sufficient to leave a lingering memory of something subtly appealing and pleasingly memorable.

"Pop" Concerts Open Tonight

The thirty-seventh season of the "Pops," that distinctively Bostonian institution, opens tonight in Symphony Hall, with Agide Jacchia as conductor and an orchestra made up of 75 Boston Symphony players. The season will be the usual two months. The floor, according to usage, will be cleared of the rows of seats provided for the more serious musical entertainments of the season just closing, and will be devoted to tables at which light refreshments will be served. The balconies will be reserved for those who prefer their music without edible accompaniment. The programs for the most part will follow established custom, which dictates pieces of varied and contrasted style, of substantial musical content, and yet of sufficiently popular quality not to demand too arduous attention. In the making of such programs Mr. Jacchia is not excelled. He is a capable, energetic and unobtrusive leader, and while he holds the music in keeping with the purpose of the "popular" entertainment idea, he also firmly upholds a high musical standard, and from time to time varies the usual round by injecting a novel piece of interest and excellence. The players, as becomes men of their quality, respond eloquently to their director. Thus the "Pops," providing recreation for the intelligence, deservedly gain in favor. The typical program of the opening night follows:

Pop Concerts Season Opens

Better than ever are the Pop concerts, which began at Symphony Hall last night. Agide Jacchia, favorite Pop conductor, led the full orchestra of Symphony players in a delightful program. Musically, the opening was thoroughly enjoyable and, in addition to the mus c, there was the customary abundance of light refreshments, which add so much to the pleasures of these Spring entertainments, unrivaled outside of Bos on.

One of the attractions of these popular concerts is the 700 admission seats, on the floor and in the second balcony, at 25 cents, the same prices prevailing before the war. These seats constitute one-fourth of the total seating capacity. They alone would make the Pops a unique attraction.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Pierre Monteux is Conductor in Final Concert at Infantry Hall.

MERLE ALCOCK IS SOLOIST

D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy is Novelty of Programme.—Contralto Pleases in Pergolesi Airs and Aria from "Don Carlos"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, concluded its Providence season last evening at Infantry Hall with a brilliant programme in which Merle Alcock, contralto, assisted as soloist. Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, inspired by Schiller's poem, occupied the place of honor on the programme. Wagner and Liszt were the other composers represented by orchestral numbers. Although the orchestra has shown a finer degree of technical finished at some of its earlier appearances here this season, last evening's performance equalled in interest any of the present series. This was due to the presence of the d'Indy work on the programme and the singing of Mme. Alcock whose vocal gifts, artistic ability and personality took her audience by storm.

M. Monteux, as usual, conducted with authority and raised the performance to artistic heights on several occasions, notably in the second and third parts of the "Wallenstein" and in the final Liszt "Les Preludes."

This was the programme:

"Wallenstein," Trilogy (after the dramatic poem of Schiller), Op. 12............d'Indy
Wallenstein's Camp.
Max and Thekla.
The Death of Wallenstein.
Prelude to "Parsifal"...............Wagner
"Salve Regina," "Eia Ergo," "Et Jesum, Benedictum" ....Pergolesi
Aria, "O Don Fatale," from the opera, "Don Carlos"........................Verdi
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3 (after Lamartine) ....Liszt

All great orchestral works must of necessity be the fruit of an inspiration of one kind or another. The composer staring hard at his ideal, writes his musical poetry or prose with all the resources that imagination and technical mastery place at his command. In the Wallenstein "Trilogy," d'Indy has painted in a highly individual and colorful style the scenes of Schiller's dramatic poem. It is doubtful, however, if he labored to give such detailed musical description of the text as some enthusiastic students of the score would have us believe. In the first movement, which is supposed to represent Wallenstein's camp, one hears a forceful and striking portrayal of the tumult and general atmosphere of such a place. There are clever hints, in melodic touch, rythm and in the use of various instrumental qualities, of the hurly-burly of a military camp.

In fact, such a movement is nothing more than a powerful stimulant to the hearer's imagination. Possessing one of a lively nature there is scarcely any limit one may set to the wedding of music and text. The first movement is musically less interesting than the second and third, for in the latter the composer enters the domain of the emotions in the portrayal of which he speaks a beautiful language. It was in the final movement, "The Death of Wallenstein," that the orchestra rose to the heights of dramatic expression. Enthusiastic applause greeted the conductor and players at its conclusion.

The solemn and impressive style of the "Parsifal" Prelude was maintained throughout its length. In this the brass choir has splendid opportunities and for the most part they were effectively met. Faulty tone on the part of one or two players were fleeting reminders of the presence of the human element even in the best of orchestras.

Mme. Alcock, who is a favorite here, received a fine welcome as she made her appearance. In the Pergolesi airs she was supported by a string orchestra and her work brought her deserved recognition. Her voice is more incisive than on former appearances here and she has the repose and vocal command of the seasoned artist. Her high notes ring out with fine quality and are made very telling when climaxes are needed.

The Verdi area, as might be expected, showed her voice to still greater advantage. She sang this number with an intensity and expression that thrilled her hearers. Her voice easily carried over full accompaniment, especially when brilliant top notes were in order. She was given an ovation at the conclusion of this number and was obliged to return several times in acknowledgment.

The Liszt "Preludes" present the composer in his most favorable light—that of brilliant and scoring and powerful climaxes. It was finely played and both conductor and men were held by applause for a few moments before they were allowed to go. A. F. P.

Mr. Monteux concluded last night a notable symphony season: At last the Boston Symphony Orchestra, barring some "dead wood" among the players which should be exchanged for new material, is approximately at its old high level of virtuosity and euphony.

Mr. Monteux has shown what it is to be a thorough musician, irrespective of nationality. It is of interest, for example, to realize that this season compositions by 17 German and Austrian composers have been played, and, furthermore, that these composers of former enemy countries have had the lions' share of the programme. France has been represented by 11 composers, Russia by eight, America by seven, Italy by three, Spain by two, Belgium by two, in addition to which have been heard compositions by the Pole, Szymanowski; the Bohemian, Smetana; the Finn, Sibelius. These figures, in themselves, speak for the extraordinary catholicity of Mr. Monteux's tastes and appreciations.

Of the novelties performed the six which linger strongest in the memory are for us the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius; the Irish songs composed by Charles Martin Loeffler for John McCormack; the suite from the Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant of Henry Gilbert; the symphony of Mr. Szymanowski; the suite, "Couvent sur l'eau," of Casella, the the "Oriental Impressions" of Henry Eichheim. Sibelius' symphony showed clearly that he remains a man of extremely simple and powerful ideas, of fearless originality and masterly workmanship. The continually nearer approach to simplicity and economy of material in Sibelius' compositions is something that younger composers could study with profit. Mr. Loeffler's compositions appeared as an example of the manner in which a cultured modern composer, with a strong poetic and dramatic sense, may turn folk melody to advantage in original composition. They represented a new and very vital departure on the part of Mr. Loeffler, and will surely be counted among his finest works. Mr. Gilbert composed music for a pageant of highly picturesque and idealistic character. The thought of the beginnings of America stirred him. He responded in spirit and with true inspiration to an occasion which would have dampened the ardor of many of us, who cannot separate the conception of a pageant from the conception of writing music for a cowlot and a brass band.

The music had virility, directness and bold imaginative sweep. Mr. Szymanowski's symphony had some of the painstaking, some of the arduous fighting with detail, which a young man's symphony is likely to have. On the other hand, it has been seldom that we have heard a young composer in late years show such seriousness of spirit and so true a grasp of the spirit of the symphonic form.

The suite of Casella is wonderful for its color, its evocation of a past period. There is a richness of coloring, a sensation of old brocades, tragedies within forbidding walls, mysteries that are far off, unhappy, and beautiful, in music which is decorative, rather than dramatic. And Mr. Eichheim's oriental impressions are examples of a most exceptional sensitiveness of ear, mystery of instrumental color, and absorption of oriental mood. Of other novelties one could speak in detail but these are the salient ones. The season was one to be remembered in the annals of the orchestra for both things: excellence in the performances, and interesting and well balanced programmes.

LIKE the audience of Friday afternoon, the audience of Saturday evening reserved its plaudits for Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra until the end of the concert. Chamber Night at the Pops

APPLICATIONS for reservations are pouring into the Chamber for the third annual "Pop of Pops"—the Chamber of Commerce Night—at the Pop Concerts, Symphony Hall, on next Monday evening, May 8th, at 8 o'clock. Memories of the past two occasions are so pleasant on the part of those members who attended that immediate action should be taken by those intending to make reservations in order to avoid disappointment.

The tickets are one dollar each, which includes a seat at a table. Members may reserve tables for 4, 5, 6 or 8 persons. First come, first served. The committee on Meetings and Assemblies is in charge of the arrangements for the concert.

The Pop Concerts, of which the Chamber Night has proven one of the most popular, are an institution of 37 summers. They are also very much Boston's own, for emulation in other cities has never led to permanent results. Agide Jacchia will again head the orchestra this season.

37TH SEASON OF POPS OPENS

Mr Jacchia Leads Orchestra of 80 in a Varied First Program

CONDUCTOR GIVEN LIVELY GREETING

The Symphony Hall 'Pops' opened last night with a crash of brass and a blare of trumpets, to mark the 37th season of this now honored Boston institution. Agide Jacchia again led an orchestra of Symphony players, 80 strong, in an initial program which ranged from Mozart to Rimsky-Korsakov, from Strauss to Wagner.

Naturally, too, Mr. Jacchia's compatriot, Mascagni, had a place, with the "Hymn to the Sun" from "Iris." With this number, the "Aida" fantasia, the "Tannhauser" overture, and Tchaikovsky's Marche Slave, there was abundance of fortissimo during the evening.

In contrast, were more subtle, soothing rhythms, as found in the "Hindu Song," the Dance of the Waves from "Loreley" (Catalani), Kreisler's "Liebesfreud," Irma Seydel's "Dirge," or Blon's "Whispering of the Flowers." The distinct novelty was "La Boutique Fantasque," a series of dances devised by Ottorino Respighi on a group of Rossini's pianoforte themes. This had color, life, and sudden, pleasing turns and tempos. Doubtless it will become a part of many a program to come.

Mr. Jacchia was given a lively greeting, and bowed his acknowledgments across a low fencing of ferns and palms, brightened here and there by potted rose bushes in full bloom. He directed with characteristic energy and sincerity, and was liberal with extra numbers, excellently placed.

The audience, a bit deliberate in assembling, ultimately filled practically every balcony seat and every table chair. As in the past ices and soft, very soft, drinks were served, with sandwiches for those who like to lunch thus with the muses. There were those who exercised a remarkable precaution by having pots of hot coffee served. An innovation of practical import was that of providing each table with an order card. It was difficult formerly to whisper an order for pretzels with the band riding thunderously with the Valkyries.

Auspicious Opening of "Pops" Season

The thirty-seventh season of the "Pops" opened last night at Symphony Hall. Agide Jacchia conducted, and a large audience applauded enthusiastically the artistic program which he had arranged. This program was not devoted to the lighter classics and popular pieces of the day, but included as well several compositions of musical worth. Novelty was not lacking either, as Mr. Jacchia introduced some selections from "La Boutique Fantasque," a ballet with music arranged from piano pieces of Rossini by Respighi. These little piano pieces were written, if we are not mistaken, by Rossini during his years of retirement from the operatic stage, passed at Paris, and although mere trifles possess a certain interest in the orchestral dress provided for them by Respighi. The opening of this present season was most auspicious in every way.

Pops Season on at Symphony

The Pops season opened last evening with its due amount of appreciation from a capacity house.

The program was well chosen, with its usual aim to please all.

The most delightful feature of the program last evening was the English horn solo given by Prof. Spyer. This was a solo intermezzo, a short but delightful melodic caprice in F, and, although this was an extra, the audience showed more than a full measure of genuine appreciation. Agide Jacchia is director.

POPS OPEN WITH VAST AUDIENCE

New Composition by Boston Girl Well Received

BY OLIN DOWNES

The largest audience that has attended a "Pop" concert opening gathered last night in Symphony Hall. Musically, too, the occasion was of exceptional brilliancy. The orchestra of Symphony players, which now numbers 75, had been evidently rehearsed with special care, and the programme, which ranged from Mozart and Rimsky-Korsakoff to Strauss and to composers of popular music, who figured prominently in the list of encores, was one well calculated to display its capabilities.

A FESTIVE BEGINNING

The "Procession of Bacchus," a festive beginning, only saddened those who remembered the days before the passing of the Volstead act. It ushered in late comers and gave place to a popular encore, and then to the sparkling overture to "Figaro's Wedding." The Spanish dance, "Panaderos," and a fantasia on melodies from Aida completed a first

Later came the "Hymn to the Sun," from Mascagni's "Iris"; a new "Dance of the Waves," from Calatani's "Loreley," recently given its premiere at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York (and a poor piece of music it is); the captivating "Hindu Song," from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," a melody of a simplicity which is yet haunting and exotic with its little chromatic refrains; the overture to "Tannhauser," always impressive.

Miss Seydel's Composition

The superb "Marche Slave" of Tschaikowsky brought an end to the programme. Among the encores was a Dirge by Miss Irma Seydel, the violinist, daughter of T. Seydel of the orchestra, and the "Herdsman's Melody," from the "Manfred" music of Schumann, played unaccompanied, and with faultless art, by the admirable Mr. Speyer, soloist on the English horn.

Miss Seydel's composition was brief, unpretentious, clearly written, with a somewhat oriental flavor. It gave pleasure, and is rather misnamed. Why do not more of our Boston composers try to compose short, good pieces for performances at the "Pops"? They need not be ashamed to do so, to figure by Verdi, Tschaikowsky, Bizet, Wagner, on these programmes. They have here an excellent chance to prove invention, ingenuity, inspiration, and incidentally provide a large public with more good music.

The audience was very enthusiastic throughout the concerts. The music and the refreshments went merrily hand in hand, in this uncommonly auspicious opening of the season.

'POPS' SEASON OPENED TO FULL HOUSE

By FREDERICK JOHNS

If the glorious Spring weather were not sufficient to make one feel gay the steenth season of the Boston Pops opened last night in Symphony Hall to a full house.

One can say a full house now without being suspected of malice, but in the old days, when the music played an accompaniment to the popping of corks and the tinkle of beer glasses, one had to be careful.

Boston's Pops now are now strictly a musical affair. The orchestra which started with forty members has grown to eighty and is capable of playing anything any composer dare write, Bolshevists, Futurists, Cubists and Decadents included.

Nowadays you sit at your table with the plate of ice cream in front of you and you absorb it with noiseless motion. If you let the spoon tinkle against the saucer a score of music lovers scowl at you, and, if you should happen to drop your glass upon the floor, Agide Jacchia, the conductor, would stop the music, single you out and probably fire his baton at you.

Last night, for example, there were such trifles on the program as "Aida," "Iris," "Tannhauser" and the Russian outpourings of Tschaikowsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Glazounoff.

If you wanted rag time or popular American airs you had to applaud loud and long. Then Mr. Jacchia would arise and perform one for you as an extra, the musicians looking scornfully as they churned it out.

However, the Pops have developed into what they are because people like them this way. The attendance is larger than it was of yore. La Boheme has given way to Beacon street and everybody is happy. Jacchia conducted admirably and the orchestra played splendidly.

PERENNIAL POPS

A Thirty-Seventh Spring and Summer Begins at Symphony Hall — Arrangements Much as Usual—Familiar Abilities and Various Fresh Pieces from Mr. Jacchia—The Mood of the Audience

WITH certain innovations of last year retained, and with no important variations from custom added, The Pops began in Symphony Hall last evening a thirty-seventh season. Once more the stage was banked with greens, imparting a festive atmosphere as appropriate to The Pops as it would be amiss at the Symphony Concerts. Again the familiar figure of Mr. Jacchia, conducting with his wonted energies and graces, faced a band of symphonic proportions that played with symphonic finish and brilliance. As was the case last year, nearly the whole string section of the Symphony Orchestra has remained on duty for The Pops, with as many wind and percussion players as the music in hand requires. Familiar in detail and in general aspect was the list of eatables and drinkables ornamented with Mr. Gluyas Williams's amusing vignettes, though now the orders are to be written, not entrusted orally to the gray capped waitresses.

Always eager to put his best foot forward in the making of a programme for the "Opening Night," Mr. Jacchia had sought out an unfamiliar number or two, and had chosen his other pieces with discriminating pains. For novelty of more than usual interest came a set of dances—or, to use the phrase of the programme, a Selection—from the ballet "La Boutique Fantasque," produced in London three years ago by Mr. Dyaghilev's company. From sundry unpublished piano-pieces by Rossini, collated and orchestrated by Respighi, came the music for this ballet, and the excerpts of last evening included a Cossack Dance, a Mazurka, a Tarantella, a Can-Can and a Galop. Certain of the English reviewers lifted their eyebrows disdainfully over these resurrections. True, to judge from the fragments now in question, the music is neither striking nor distinctive, but it is by no means unpleasing it smacks of the composer's characteristic wit and gaiety and its orchestral dress has been tastefully and effectively prepared. A "Dance of the Waves," from the opera, "Loreley," by Catalani (lesser Italian composer of the late nineteenth century), produced last winter at the Metropolitan, proved a well scored bit of scenic music, recalling the manner and technique of Ponchielli. The third and last novel item was a conventionally brilliant Spanish dance, "Panaderos," by the Russian Glazunov, whose first visit to this country now impends. If memory does not slip, Mr. Bolm often dances to it.

Well tried pieces made the remainder of the programme. Mozart's sparkling Overture to "Figaro's Wedding," and Wagner's to "Tannhäuser," added a touch of dignity to a list that included besides a Fantasia on "Aida," the "Procession of Bacchus" from "Sylvia" the grandiloquent "Hymn to the Sun," from Mascagni's "Iris," Rimsky-Korsakov's "Song of India," the waltz, "Roses from the South," by Johann Strauss and, for lusty ending, Chaikovsky's "Marche Slave." The "extras" were numerous; some of them, like Miss Seydel's "Dirge," were new; and for one of them Mr. Speyer repeated from a recent Symphony Concert his admirable performance of the solo for unaccompanied English horn in Schumann's music to "Manfred." Before the present season of Pops is ended the customary clamor for more "popular" programmes will no doubt arise, but those who crave this lighter fare seem to be a diminishing company. Unless all signs fail, evening after evening Symphony Hall will be filled, often to overflowing, with those who relish the particular sort of programme, neither too "light" nor too "heavy," that Mr. Jacchia has shaped and which he reproduces, changed in detail yet essentially the same in substance, throughout the season. It was good to hear last evening the seductive Waltz of Strauss, music that still supplies the mild intoxication that the Eighteenth Amendment has removed from the beverages of The Pops. With the disappearance of the Rhine Wine and the Culmbacher has gone the preponderance of bass drum and cymbals that in general characterized these concerts in the past. A sedater entertainment remains, more decorous on the floor, far more musical on the stage.

THRONG ENTHUSES AT OPENING POP CONCERT

Symphony Hall Crowded by Music Lovers

Highly Appreciative Gathering Hears Fine Program

Changes come and go, but the "Pops," Boston's inimitable institution, goes on forever!

There was a time, perhaps three years ago, when those who were inevitably "in the know" asserted, most positively, that "the Pops," as a real feature of Boston's real attractions, were on the verge of complete extinction.

Others, much wiser, as time has proved, contended that any institution which had endured as long as Boston's Pop concerts, and had also attained the degree of popular appreciation which these concerts had done, was not likely to go under from so seemingly superficial a cause as the enactment of the 18th Amendment.

In the old days, both when the "Pops" were located on Hamilton pl—harking back to the times of the old Music Hall—and later, when they had become the favorite resort of that part of the population which cared enough for good music, pleasingly rendered, to journey to the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington avs in order to enjoy such a rarity, it was often customary to remark that comparatively few persons would visit the "Pops" but for the fact that the license of the organization gave them the right to sell beer, ale and light wines for immediate consumption upon the premises.

Ever since the 18th Amendment has become a fact, evidence of the complete fallacy of this contention has been becoming more and more obvious, and both the size and the enthusiasm of last evening's attendance at the opening concert of the season gave additional proof of this.

For the audience which crowded Symphony Hall, literally to the last seat, eager to show its enthusiasm for the sort of concert which the beginning of the Spring season of 1922 affords the Boston public, gave every possible sign of delight, of appreciation and of enthusiasm for what Conductor Agide Jacchia and his orchestra accomplished.

Judged from the viewpoint of the old-time casual observer, last night's audience was not, exactly speaking, of the same general type which used to mark the opening concert of the Spring series of "Pops." Less fashionable—for want of a better word—less attentive, as regards the feminine portion, at least, of the latest mandates of fashion, than were the audiences of perhaps six or 10 years ago—last night's gathering demonstrated not only that it was a highly appreciative assemblage of musical persons, but also a gathering of regular human beings who could thoroughly enjoy an evening of alleged "Bohemian" atmosphere, without any of the introductions which are so often considered necessary to the success of such a gathering.

Last evening's program opened with Delibes' "Procession of Bacchus," followed by the ever-popular overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." More familiar to the popular taste, perhaps, were the "Hymn to the Sun," from Mascagni's "Iris," the Fantasia from Verdi's "Aida," and the overture to Lohengrin's "Tannhauser."

From first to last, last evening's large and applausive audience—enthused upon nothing stronger than ginger ale, soda lemonade and other kindred beverages—gave every known sign of expressing its entire delight in the concert which was being rendered.

With or without real beer, Boston's annual Spring institution of Pop concerts appears to be one of the changeless institutions of the calendar, and it is quite certain to one who has witnessed their openings for some seasons, that they have already proved themselves of those truly unusual things which have no special bearing upon outside facts, but which merely go on, probably by reason both of their own intrinsic merit and of the popular demand which they so surely supply.

TO The Daily Telegraph in London, Herbert Hughes, the Irish composer, best known hereabouts by his folk-pieces on Mr. McCormack's programmes, lately sent the following note about Mr. Loeffler and his new "Irish Fantasias." Mr. Hughes, it seems, was Mr. McCormack's companion through much of last winter and, as such, heard Mr. Loeffler's music in rehearsal and performance at Symphony Hall in March. He writes:

> Another distinguished, cultivated and charming figure in American musical life is Charles Martin Loeffler. It was my privilege to attend two rehearsals, and hear the first public performance of the second, third and fifth of his "Irish Fantasias for Voice and Orchestra," the soloist being McCormack, the orchestra the Boston Symphony, conducted by Monteux. Loeffler, who was born in Alsace in 1861, is a practical musician as well as a composer. He has the technique of the orchestra at his finger tips; he writes for each instrument with a sort of affectionate knowledge of its qualities and limitations, and the happy and obvious result is that the orchestra says what he means.
> You could not come into touch with so delightful a personality without realizing inside the first five minutes that you were in the company of a cultivated cosmopolitan. His intellectual interests are far-flung. Yet it must have been this very cosmopolitanism which dictated the employment [in the Fantasias] of a pre-war Straussian orchestra. The whole of the kitchen machinery was mobilized, not forgetting the xylophone. All the effects "came off," of course, but (however odd it may seem) Ireland is one of the few countries in the world where instruments of percussion (other than the Orange drum) are conspicuous by their absence, and their intrusion into Mr. Loeffler's score was a characteristic anachronism only emphasized by free quotation of well-known folk-tunes. The beautiful old "Colleen dhas crutha na mbo"—a melancholy melody if ever there was one—fell strangely on our ears when disguised as a flippant tune played on a piccolo. Folk-tunes seem to have been invented so that they may be transmogrified by the creative artist; he takes that as his privilege by divine right. But if the artist only succeeds in creating a new genre, he must be surprised if the listener is at first unconvinced, if to some of us the Fiddler of Dooney has become the Fiddler of Boston, Massachusetts, and Caitilin ni-Houlihan has garbed herself in the tricolor of the stars and stripes. Nevertheless, Mr. Loeffler can give you a first-rate vocal line and a fine climax when he wills. Into these "Fantasias" McCormack put his heart and soul and at that superb phrase "The God who led through ocean red all Israel on," even the 'busman on holiday had to admit a thrill.

POPS RE-COMMENCE SPRIGHTLY PLAYING

Light Music Opens 37th Annual Season At Symphony Hall Last Night

The Pops, that distinctly Bostonian institution which age cannot wither nor the Volstead Act stale, opened for the 37th year at Symphony Hall last night. The concerts will continue for the usual two months nightly, except Sunday, closing about July 1.

In thirty-seven years the Pops have become so marked a feature of the Boston spring and early summer that it is a waste of perfectly good space to do more than to record the annual opening. The 75 symphony players who compose the orchestra are again under the baton of Agide Jacchia, who in the last several seasons has worked such wonders in program-making that he has made the concerts more popular than they have ever been among Boston music lovers.

Last night's opening program included in its eleven numbers the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," a fantasia from "Aida," the Hymn to the Sun from Mascagni's "Iris," the "Tannhauser" overture, and a number of light selections. The audience was large and had the proper opening night enthusiasm.

Tonight will be Wellesley College night. Thursday night will be devoted to a program of Russian music.

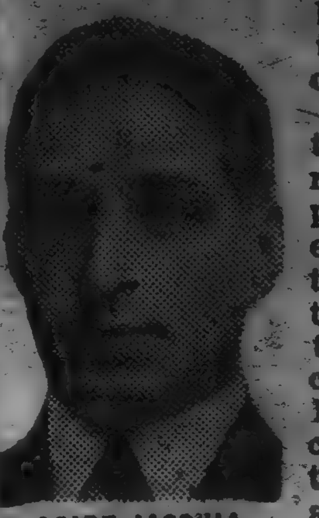
POPS MAKING FINE RECORD

This opening week of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall has been all around the best on record.



AGIDE JACCHIA

It looks as if the public is more keenly appreciative than ever before of the fact that these are the the only concerts of the kind in the country and that 700 seats, at the floor tables and in the second balcony, are still available for the good old-fashioned price of a quarter. That price hasn't been changed since the concerts were established a third of a century ago.

This is some record, in view of the fact that the present orchestra of 80 Symphony players is about twice the size of the first Pops band. Agide Jacchia is not only one of he most accomplished conductors in Pops history, but also one of the most popular. Tonight's program follows:—

"POPS" DOING A HEAVY BUSINESS

Operatic Program Is Scheduled for May 9 by Conductor Jacchia at Symphony Hall

The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall are now completing the opening week of this their thirty seventh season. A night of particular interest is Tuesday, May 9, which will bring an operatic program. In such music Mr. Jacchia, the famous former conductor of many seasons of opera, is wonderfully eloquent. For Monday, Wednesday and Thursday nights respectively the Boston Chamber of Commerce, the Durant, Inc., and the Massachusetts Maine Daughters will be present in numbers, but these and all nights are public. On Friday, May 12, the banners of Amherst College will float, and the Glee Club contribute to the program.

POST - MAY 6.

SYMPHONY POPS POPULAR AS EVER

Everybody from New York and other cities who visits the Boston Pops goes away wondering why such an enjoyable entertainment isn't given elsewhere.

Here in Boston where we have had two months of Pops for thirty years or more we are apt to take them as a matter of course, and we don't realize our luck.

The facts are that the Pops are not primarily a form of entertainment given for revenue. Their chief purpose is to provide work for the Boston Symphony musicians so that they can be held in Boston and continue to give their best to the orchestra.

It doesn't matter what great conductors and what famous bands come to this city, we quickly discover that the Boston instrument known as the Symphony Orchestra is a finer instrument than any other. It sometimes happens that poorer instruments are better played than ours. If you handed Kreisler a cheap fiddle he could undoubtedly play it better than some second rate violinist could play a Stradivarius.

When our orchestra was broken in halves by the war and then by the musicians' strike, it was predicted that its tonal superiority would vanish forever. Instead it is as good a band as it ever was.

The reason is that our musicians are given a very long season; that they play together almost continuously. In New York and elsewhere a season of thirty weeks at the most is all a Symphony musician can expect. Here they get fifty weeks if they want them. The Pops, therefore, are a means to the end of keeping our orchestra the best in the world. And that explains why they go on year after year whether they make a profit or not. Though recently they have always made a profit.

TELEGRAM-MAY 6

Otherwise the only concerts of the week are the springtime Pops continuing from evening to evening in Symphony Hall, and by all signs, as welcome as ever to the public frequenting them. Again it approves the eatables, drinkables and "smokables" proffered and consumed. Again it likes the general plan of the concerts; but most of all, as the newer fashion of the The Pops goes, it finds pleasure in the playing of the orchestra, and in the pieces through which the able and energetic Jacchia leads it. Such audiences are well disposed to novel pieces, but the programmes for next week proffer in the main familiar numbers. Back will come the Overture of Suppé, "Poet and Peasant"; the "Selection" from Herbert's "Mademoiselle Modiste"; Thomas's Overture to "Raymond"; the Fantasia from "Carmen"; the Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser"; dances from Coppelia." Fresh numbers are also discoverable—a Potpourri on Saturday from "Sally"; another on Friday from "The Chocolate Soldier"; while on Friday also the third movement of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade"—the love-scene of young prince and young rincess—will be shifted from the Sym- hony Concerts to The Pops. Tuesday, noreover, brings a full-fledged "oper- tic programme," with fragments of talian, French, Russian and German peras—from "William Tell" to "Louise," rom "The Tales of Hoffmann" to "Die alküre"—all music in which Mr. Jac- hia's operatic blood and breeding tell. inally, though "special evenings" are t down for Monday, Wednesday, Thurs- y and Friday, on each occasion there ll be room—and at the tables—for the olic.

Second Week of Pops Brings Special Nights

Monday night is Boston Chamber of Commerce night at the Pops. Tuesday Mr Jacchia has set an attractive operatic program, with an intermezzo from Mascagni's L'Amico Fritz," an unfamiliar opera based on the popular story of Erckman-Chatrian as its chief novelty. Wednesday the Durant, Inc, has reserved a block of places. Thursday the Massachusetts Maine Daughters are celebrating. Friday is Amherst College night, with the college glee club assisting. All these evenings are open to the public.

The program for tomorrow night is as follows: "Procession of the Sardar," Ippolito-Ivanov; overture, "Poet and Peasant," Suppe; waltz, "Girls of Baden," Komzak; fantasia, "Faust," Gounod; "Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; "Ave Maria," Schubert; "Whispering of the Flowers," Blon; "Bacchanale," from "Samson and Leilah," Saint-Saens; selection, "Mlle Modiste," Herbert; waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," Strauss; introduction, act 3, "Lohengrin," Wagner.

POPS MAKING FINE RECORD

This opening week of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall has been all around the best on record.

AGIDE JACCHIA

It looks as if the public is more keenly appreciative than ever before of the fact that these are the only concerts of the kind in the country and that 700 seats, at the floor tables and in the second balcony, are still available for the good old-fashioned price of a quarter. That price hasn't been changed since the concerts were established a third of a century ago.

This is some record, in view of the fact that the present orchestra of 80 Symphony players is about twice the size of the first Pops band. Agide Jacchia is not only one of he most accomplished conductors in Pops history, but also one of the most popular. Tonight's program follows:—

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"...... ....Tschaikowsky
Overture to "Oberon"...........Weber

"POPS" DOING A HEAVY BUSINESS

Operatic Program Is Scheduled for May 9 by Conductor Jacchia at Symphony Hall

The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall are now completing the opening week of this their thirty seventh season. A night of particular interest is Tuesday, May 9, which will bring an operatic program. In such music Mr. Jacchia, the famous former conductor of many seasons of opera, is wonderfully eloquent. For Monday, Wednesday and Thursday nights respectively the Boston Chamber of Commerce, the Durant, Inc., and the Massachusetts Maine Daughters will be present in numbers, but these and all nights are public. On Friday, May 12, the banners of Amherst College will float, and the Glee Club contribute to the program.

POST - MAY 6.

SYMPHONY POPS POPULAR AS EVER

Everybody from New York and other cities who visits the Boston Pops goes away wondering why such an enjoyable entertainment isn't given elsewhere.

Here in Boston where we have had two months of Pops for thirty years or more we are apt to take them as a matter of course, and we don't realize our luck.

The facts are that the Pops are not primarily a form of entertainment given for revenue. Their chief purpose is to provide work for the Boston Symphony musicians so that they can be held in Boston and continue to give their best to the orchestra.

It doesn't matter what great conductors and what famous bands come to this city, we quickly discover that the Boston instrument known as the Symphony Orchestra is a finer instrument than any other. It sometimes happens that poorer instruments are better played than ours. If you handed Kreisler a cheap fiddle he could undoubtedly play it better than some second rate violinist could play a Stradivarius.

When our orchestra was broken in halves by the war and then by the musicians' strike, it was predicted that its tonal superiority would vanish forever. Instead it is as good a band as it ever was.

The reason is that our musicians are given a very long season; that they play together almost continuously. In New York and elsewhere a season of thirty weeks at the most is all a Symphony musician can expect. Here they get fifty weeks if they want them. The Pops, therefore, are a means to the end of keeping our orchestra the best in the world. And that explains why they go on year after year whether they make a profit or not. Though recently they have always made a profit.

TELEGRAM-MAY. 6

Otherwise the only concerts of the week are the springtime Pops continuing from evening to evening in Symphony Hall, and by all signs, as welcome as ever to the public frequenting them. Again it approves the eatables, drinkables and "smokables" proffered and consumed. Again it likes the general plan of the concerts; but most of all, as the newer fashion of the The Pops goes, it finds pleasure in the playing of the orchestra, and in the pieces through which the able and energetic Jacchia leads it. Such audiences are well disposed to novel pieces, but the programmes for next week proffer in the main familiar numbers. Back will come the Overture of Suppé, "Poet and Peasant"; the "Selection" from Herbert's "Mademoiselle Modiste"; Thomas's Overture to "Raymond"; the Fantasia from "Carmen"; the Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser"; dances from Coppèlia." Fresh numbers are also discoverable—a Potpourri on Saturday from "Sally"; another on Friday from "The Chocolate Soldier"; while on Friday also the third movement of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" — the love-scene of young prince and young princess—will be shifted from the Symphony Concerts to The Pops. Tuesday, moreover, brings a full-fledged "operatic programme," with fragments of Italian, French, Russian and German operas—from "William Tell" to "Louise," from "The Tales of Hoffmann" to "Die Walküre"—all music in which Mr. Jacchia's operatic blood and breeding tell. Finally, though "special evenings" are set down for Monday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, on each occasion there will be room—and at the tables—for the public.

Second Week of Pops Brings Special Nights

Monday night is Boston Chamber of Commerce night at the Pops. Tuesday Mr Jacchia has set an attractive operatic program, with an intermezzo from Mascagni's L'Amico Fritz," an unfamiliar opera based on the popular story of Erckman-Chatrian as its chief novcity. Wednesday the Durant, Inc, has reserved a block of places. Thursday the Massachusetts Maine Daughters are celebrating. Friday is Amherst College night, with the college glee club assisting. All these evenings are open to the public.

The program for tomorrow night is as follows: "Procession of the Sardar," Ippolito-Ivanov; overture, "Poet and Peasant," Suppe; waltz, "Girls of Baden," Komzak; fantasia, "Faust," Gounod; "Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; "Ave Maria," Schubert; "Whispering of the Flowers," Blon; "Bacchanale," from "Samson and Lelilah," Saint-Saens; selection, "Mlle Modiste," Herbert; waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," Strauss; introduction, act 3, "Lohengrin," Wagner.

POP CONCERT GIVEN FOR BUSINESS MEN

Chamber of Commerce Has Night at Symphony Hall

More than a thousand attended the annual night of the Boston Chamber of Commerce at the Symphony Hall Pops last night. The program was well received and encores were demanded again and again.

Judging by the applause, by far and away the most enthusiastically received selection on the program was Suppe's "Poet and Peasant." Schubert's "Ave Maria," played by solo violin, harp, organ and strings, was another piece of exquisite perfection. The "Bacchanale" from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah" was very well received, as was the "Procession of the Sardar" by Ippolitiv-Ivanov.

A fantasia from Gounod's "Faust" and the "Dance of the Hours" from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda" were others that attracted particular attention. The program was closed with the introduction to Act 3 of Wagner's "Lohengrin."

HERALD=MAY. 11

TOWARD the end of the week, Mr. Monteux will depart for Paris, London, and, possibly other European cities, less "for rest and change," as the doctors say, than to spy out the land for deserving music, possible or desirable at the Symphony Concerts next winter. Upon his return in July and on the American countryside will come his time for rest—and also study. If the chronicles of the winter in the newspapers are to be trusted, Paris may yield him little. Variously have French composers written, variously has their writing been played; but the reviewers lingered only over a new piece by Roussel, now a matured composer; and "Horace Victorieux," Honegger's "ode" for both chorus and orchestra. Both are likely to come to Mr. Monteux's ear, along with pages numberless from the portfolios of the unproduced. Who knows, besides, what Monsieur Ravel or Monsieur Milhaud, for example, may have up his sleeve, inviting to American ears? In Paris, too Monsieur Stravinsky may also await the conductor—with suggestions. He may even inquire why his "valiant Monteux" of the old days has not played in Boston as orchestral suite his music to "Le Sacré du Printemps," even as did Mr. Stowkowski in Philadelphia. Our conductor has plausible excuses. Yet may Monsieur Stravinsky dispel them and energize him to the bold venture! Mr. Stowkowski dared it; and no plagues fell upon him from even Philadelphian heavens.

In London, Mr. Monteux's harvest may be richer. The new generation of British composers is fertile and diligent; not a few of their pieces await and deserve hearing in Boston; from spirited beginnings with them in the season of 1920-21, Mr. Monteux—often because scores were unattainable—hardly kept the pace through the musical year lately ended. We have yet, for example, to hear Holst's be-praised and be-labored suite, "The Planets," though New York and Chicago have both made acquaintance with it. Bantock's "Symphony of the Hebrides" has long stood on Mr. Monteux's "waiting list." Tone-poems of Bax, written in recent years, also invit hearing; the music of Arthur Bliss, bolde of the youngsters, is barely known [illegible] Williams "Pastoral Symphony" [illegible] last winter, should follow his "London Symphony" through concert-rooms over-seas. Again the music affirms a composer like no other of our time.

To London also, to the kindly tables of Messrs. Chester, the "new" Italians, the Germans and the Austrians off the beaten track, an occasional Spaniard, like de Falla, also send their scores. By the news of the winter ,they have written little that was notable; but two hours with a manuscript is more illuminating to a conductor than twenty reviews. At least, Bartook has come forth upon the West from Hungary; while by the virtue or fragments from "The Three-Cornered Hat," de Falla deserves further hearing in Boston. Bon voyage, of course, to Mr. Monteux; but also return full-freighted.

POP CONCERT GIVEN FOR BUSINESS MEN

Chamber of Commerce Has Night at Symphony Hall

More than a thousand attended the annual night of the Boston Chamber of Commerce at the Symphony Hall Pops last night. The program was well received and encores were demanded again and again.

Judging by the applause, by far and away the most enthusiastically received selection on the program was Suppe's "Poet and Peasant." Schubert's "Ave Maria," played by solo violin, harp, organ and strings, was another piece of exquisite perfection. The "Bacchanale" from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah" was very well received, as was the "Procession of the Sardar" by Ippolitiv-Ivanov.

A fantasia from Gounod's "Faust" and the "Dance of the Hours" from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda" were others that attracted particular attention. The program was closed with the introduction to Act 3 of Wagner's "Lohengrin."

Symphony Hall "Pops"

Third Week of the Pops

This, the third week of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall, offers rather more than the usual array of attractive numbers and interesting special nights. Monday, the fantasia on Wagner's "Lohengrin," the "Tempest" music from "Othello," Liszt's Second Rhapsody, "Eili, Eili," Handel's Largo and Grieg's "Lyric Suite" are but a part of an especially attractive program.

Tuesday night, students and alumnae of Radcliffe College will be present in numbers, and the Radcliffe Club Chorus and Radcliffe Choral Society, under Dr A. T. Davison, will sing numbers, while Laura Littlefield, who is a graduate of Radcliffe, will provide a soprano solo. Of the symphonic part of the program, "Finlandia," the "Oberon" Overture and the Finale of "Scheherazade" may be mentioned. Wednesday's will be a "Wagner program." Selections from "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin" "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and the "Dusk of the Gods" will be played.

Thursday the Boston City Club will celebrate and its glee club will sing, although this program, which contains such popular numbers as Chabrier's "Espana," the "William Tell" Overture, the Blue Danube Waltz and the "Peer Gynt" Suite, is open to the public, as are all other nights. For Friday, the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" and the "Roumanian Rhapsody" are perhaps of the highest standing musically, while Saturday will bring the Rhapsody "Italia," the "1812" Overture, Dvorak's Largo and a violoncello solo by Josef Keller.

GLOBE-MAY. 14

MUSICAL COMMENT—OLIN DOWNES

Opportunity in "Pops" for American Composers—Have Yet to Take Advantage of It—Wagner Bill

The tables are turning all the time on the pet argument of the American composer, that he is being neglected, while European composers of even very inferior ability are given preference on programmes in his stead.

There is in Boston a notable institution known as the "Pops." At the "Pops" short compositions, especially those of not too serious a nature, are always welcome. From time to time Mr. Jacchia puts on his programme a work by an American composer who is little known. Usually he is a local light.

Mr. Jacchia would unquestionably be only too glad to get more good, short pieces, for his programmes. These pieces would be played by an orchestra of 75 virtuosi. Where is the American composer?

For two seasons in Boston Mr. Georges Longy conducted a notable series of concerts as director of the Boston Musical Association. On each programme it was desired to place one work by an American composer. Well, it was like finding hen's teeth to locate any compositions of interest which would not take too long in performance, nor demand too many instruments for a relatively small society to perform.

Mr. Longy sent out appeals, through agents, through the mail, for the American composer to show forth and display his valuable unperformed manuscripts. Mr. Longy had to adopt all kinds of expedients, even to get music which could by courtesy be called new and American in its origin.

It never seems to have entered the American composer's head that he could afford to do something well within his technical powers and leave unturned no opportunity of hearing himself played. No! The American composer wants to write symphonies, symphonic poems, overtures, and have them played by a leading symphony orchestra, such as the symphony orchestras of Boston, New York and Chicago.

Nothing less will please his highness. As a result, when the Boston Symphony, for example, does play a work by an American composer, there are revealed sometimes good ideas, sometimes not good ideas, but very rarely ideas presented in their most advantageous manner for the orchestra. This is because the composer has not had experience in scoring, experience in judging of the proportions and the form of his work from the standpoint of practical performance, which is the only standpoint that amounts to anything, anyhow. And then, forsooth, the American composer bewails the fact that he is neglected and without honor in his own country!

The Boston Symphony notably goes far afield in encouraging native talent. Singers perform each concert a great number of American songs—the greatest singers, we mean opera stars, the singers who give concerts in Symphony Hall. And they look for more. Smaller organizations, such as the one started and unhappily given up by Mr. Longy, beg them for compositions. There are semi-popular concerts, where it would do the composer no harm in the world to figure by the side of creative artists, who range all the way from Mozart and Haydn to the Strauss of the waltzes, the Sousa of the marches, the Wagners and Debussys and Charpentiers of today. And there you are! The American composer, with severe brow and exclusive frown, sits aloof, and loftily announces that no one cares to play his compositions.

THIRD WEEK OF POPS

The third week of the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall offers a number of interesting programmes and special nights. On Monday, May 15, the fantasia of Wagner's "Lohengrin," the "Tempest" music from "Othello," Liszt's second rhapsody, "Eili, Eili," Handel's largo and Grieg's lyric suite are part of the programme. On Tuesday night students and alumnae of Radcliffe College will be present in numbers and the Radcliffe Club Chorus and Radcliffe Choral Society under Dr. A. T. Davison will sing numbers, while Laura Littlefield, who is a graduate of Radcliffe, will provide a soprano solo. Of the symphonic part of the programme, "Finlandia," the "Oberon" overture and the finale of "Scheherazade" may be mentioned. Wednesday's Pop Concert will be devoted to a Wagner programme, which is always one of the most popular of Pop nights. On Thursday the Boston City Club will celebrate and their glee club will sing, although this programme, which contains such popular numbers as Chabrier's "Espana," the "William Tell" overture, the "Blue Danube" waltz and the "Peer Gynt" suite, is open to the public, as are all other nights. For Friday the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" and the Roumanian rhapsody are perhaps of the highest standing musically, while Saturday will bring the rhapsody "Italia," the "1812" overture, Dv[illegible]oloncello solo b[illegible] Josef Keller.

Third Week of the Pops

This, the third week of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall, offers rather more than the usual array of attractive numbers and interesting special nights. Monday, the fantasia on Wagner's "Lohengrin," the "Tempest" music from "Othello," Liszt's Second Rhapsody, "Eili, Eili," Handel's Largo and Grieg's "Lyric Suite" are but a part of an especially attractive program.

Tuesday night, students and alumnae of Radcliffe College will be present in numbers, and the Radcliffe Club Chorus and Radcliffe Choral Society, under Dr A. T. Davison, will sing numbers, while Laura Littlefield, who is a graduate of Radcliffe, will provide a soprano solo. Of the symphonic part of the program, "Finlandia," the "Oberon" Overture and the Finale of "Scheherazade" may be mentioned. Wednesday's will be a "Wagner program." Selections from "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin" "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and the "Dusk of the Gods" will be played.

Thursday the Boston City Club will celebrate and its glee club will sing, although this program, which contains such popular numbers as Chabrier's "Espana," the "William Tell" Overture, the Blue Danube Waltz and the "Peer Gynt" Suite, is open to the public, as are all other nights. For Friday, the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" and the "Roumanian Rhapsody" are perhaps of the highest standing musically, while Saturday will bring the Rhapsody "Italia," the "1812" Overture, Dvorak's Largo and a violoncello solo by Josef Keller.

MUSICAL COMMENT—OLIN DOWNES

Opportunity in "Pops" for American Composers—Have Yet to Take Advantage of It—Wagner Bill

The tables are turning all the time on the pet argument of the American composer, that he is being neglected, while European composers of even very inferior ability are given preference on programmes in his stead.

There is in Boston a notable institution known as the "Pops." At the "Pops" short compositions, especially those of not too serious a nature, are always welcome. From time to time Mr. Jacchia puts on his programme a work by an American composer who is little known. Usually he is a local light.

Mr. Jacchia would unquestionably be only too glad to get more good, short pieces, for his programmes. These pieces would be played by an orchestra of 75 virtuosi. Where is the American composer?

For two seasons in Boston Mr. Georges Longy conducted a notable series of concerts as director of the Boston Musical Association. On each programme it was desired to place one work by an American composer. Well, it was like finding hen's teeth to locate any compositions of interest which would not take too long in performance, nor demand too many instruments for a relatively small society to perform.

Mr. Longy sent out appeals, through agents, through the mail, for the American composer to show forth and display his valuable unperformed manuscripts. Mr. Longy had to adopt all kinds of expedients, even to get music which could by courtesy be called new and American in its origin.

It never seems to have entered the American composer's head that he could afford to do something well within his technical powers and leave unturned no opportunity of hearing himself played. No! The American composer wants to write symphonies, symphonic poems, overtures, and have them played by a leading symphony orchestra, such as the symphony orchestras of Boston, New York and Chicago.

Nothing less will please his highness. As a result, when the Boston Symphony, for example, does play a work by an American composer, there are revealed sometimes good ideas, sometimes not good ideas, but very rarely ideas presented in their most advantageous manner for the orchestra. This is because the composer has not had experience in scoring, experience in judging of the proportions and the form of his work from the standpoint of practical performance, which is the only standpoint that amounts to anything, anyhow. And then, forsooth, the American composer bewails the fact that he is neglected and without honor in his own country!

The Boston Symphony notably goes far afield in encouraging native talent. Singers perform each concert a great number of American songs—the greatest singers, we mean opera stars, the singers who give concerts in Symphony Hall. And they look for more. Smaller organizations, such as the one started and unhappily given up by Mr. Longy, beg them for compositions. There are semi-popular concerts, where it would do the composer no harm in the world to figure by the side of creative artists, who range all the way from Mozart and Haydn to the Strauss of the waltzes, the Sousa of the marches, the Wagners and Debussys and Charpentiers of today. And there you are! The American composer, with severe brow and exclusive frown, sits aloof, and loftily announces that no one cares to play his compositions.

THIRD WEEK OF POPS

The third week of the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall offers a number of interesting programmes and special nights. On Monday, May 15, the fantasia of Wagner's "Lohengrin," the "Tempest" music from "Othello," Liszt's second rhapsody, "Eili, Eili," Handel's largo and Grieg's lyric suite are part of the programme. On Tuesday night students and alumnae of Radcliffe College will be present in numbers and the Radcliffe Club Chorus and Radcliffe Choral Society under Dr. A. T. Davison will sing numbers, while Laura Littlefield, who is a graduate of Radcliffe, will provide a soprano solo. Of the symphonic part of the programme, "Finlandia," the "Oberon" overture and the finale of "Scheherazade" may be mentioned. Wednesday's Pop Concert will be devoted to a Wagner programme, which is always one of the most popular of Pop nights. On Thursday the Boston City Club will celebrate and their glee club will sing, although this programme, which contains such popular numbers as Chabrier's "Espana," the "William Tell" overture, the "Blue Danube" waltz and the "Peer Gynt" suite, is open to the public, as are all other nights. For Friday the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" and the Roumanian rhapsody are perhaps of the highest standing musically, while Saturday will bring the rhapsody "Italia," the "1812" overture, Dvorak's largo and a violoncello solo by Josef Keller.

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

The Fourth Week of a Series of Concerts Unique in the East—In Boston They Succeed, in Other Cities They Have Failed

THERE is no equivalent in New York to The Pops of Boston, and for years there has been none. In the earlier days of the Madison Square Garden attempts were made there to maintain a similar series of spring and summer concerts. In one venture Mr. Seidl and his orchestra provided the music; in another Mr. Damrosch. All failed—for lack of a regular and sustaining public. A few years ago in Philadelphia, the Association that controls Mr. Stokowski's orchestra set afoot Pop Concerts—and in a fortnight, it was clear that no sufficient public was rallying to them. Chicago, warmly as it regards its orchestra, has no such concerts. Indeed in no city of the Middle West, in cursory recollection, are there summer concerts by a resident or a visiting orchestra.

Seemingly then, from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, there are no Pop Concerts but the Boston Pops. Few cities lack the means to such entertainment; yet all except Boston, lack the inclination. Here moreover, the favor of the public is assured, increasing rather than diminishing. Some forsaw the end of The Pops when it was no longer possible for listeners to stock their tables with gentle stimulants. Yet nothing happened beyond the usual content. Again the end was at hand when Mr. Jacchia made his programmes of more serious pieces than had been the custom. But again the public gave no sign of displeasure. So have The Pops become an institution alike for those who arrange them and those who enjoy them. With both fortunately, they remain a live institution. Next week, then, the concerts will run usual course—a "special night" here, a "special night" there; new pieces once and again upon the programme; and conductor and orchestra as usual upon their mettle. The bystander has only to wish them a luck—assured

FINE PROGRAMS FOR POP CONCERTS

There is a certain harmony about the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall —a harmony over and above the strains which come from the Pops Orchestra. This is the blending of music, refreshments and sociable converse. It explains the huge popular success of the Pops, an attraction to be found only in Boston.

Agide Jacchia, Pops conductor, has made a set of programs brimful of interest for the coming week. For Monday, such Pops favorites as the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Finale of "Scheherazade," and Chabrier's "Espana," will be played.

Simmons College will celebrate Tuesday night and sing a group of songs. The Women's Clyt Club and other organizations will also be represented this week. But all Pops nights are open to the public at large.

HERALD MAY.21

CLASSICAL MUSIC AT POP CONCERTS

Mr Jacchia, during his five years as conductor of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, has included in his program more of the regular repertory of the Symphony concerts than any of his predecessors ventured upon. "Classical" music, using the term in its everyday rather than its esoteric sense, has made good with a popular audience in a manner not paralleled elsewhere in the musical history of America. The pieces played at the Pops are really chosen by the audience. The conductor plays not what he likes, or what he believes to be the best music, but what the audiences wil lapplaud. If a new number is not cordially applauded the first few times it is given, it is withdrawn as a failure, no matter whether it was composed by Beethoven or by Irving Berlin. Hence when numbers from the regular Symphony concert program win a place for themselves at the Pops they must do it by pleasing the audience, and not the critics.

This willingness of Pops audiences to enjoy and applaud good music is one of the most hopeful signs for the musical future of this city and country observable. Music has in the past appealed to too limited a public in America. It is only now beginning to win its way with the average man, or for that matter with the average woman. Actual listening with enjoyment to great music is worth any amount of reading or attending lectures upon the appreciation of music.

No matter if the people in the Pops audiences have not always a clear or even a confused knowledge of what musical critics and historians have written about the artistic value of the best pieces played there. If they really like Wagner better than Nevin or than Irving Berlin it does not matter whether they have or have not heard that he is commonly considered by the best judges a greater composer.

Supercilious Culture

We have had too much in America of the people who dare not like a piece of music until they have made sure that its composer is prominently mentioned in Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians. There is really more hope in the spontaneous appreciation of less consciously "cultured" individuals. Give the public the best music, without labeling it as good or bad, and one finds public taste not so hopelessly unsound as it seems.

In music, as in other things, a little learning is a dangerous thing. The person with a natural liking for music is too often superciliously tutored in what he should like to be saved until he either rebels and goes in for jazz or meekly rhapsodies over the more tiresome minor works of Beethoven and Bach.

But at the Pops no work is labeled good music, or bad music. It is played because people seem to like it and for no other reason. Yet this week the programs contain a long list of things from the regular Symphony concert repertory.

To particularize, Monday night the Women's City Club and others will hear among other things the Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" of Mendelssohn, the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," an excerpt from one of Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" suites, the finale from Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade," and Chabrier's "Espana," no less than five out of 11 numbers being from the Symphony concert repertory.

Tuesday night Simmons College will hear Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, the overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser," and Berlioz' "Rackoczy March," besides numbers by Liszt, Greig and Bizet. Wednesday Northeastern College will be offered only one number from the Symphony repertory, Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, but there will also be music by Verdi, Liszt, Greig and Schumann.

What Is Played

Thursday Rossini's "William Tell" Overture, Chabrier's "Espana," the Finale from Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, and the Ride of the Valkyries appear on a program also offering numbers by Grieg, Schubert, Sibelius, Saint-Saens and Dvorak (not the "Humoresque," but a "Slavonic Dance").

Friday the "Ranz des Vaches" from Schumann's "Manfred" music, an excerpt from Ippolitov-Ivanov's "Caucassian Sketches," Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, and music by Wagner, Rachmaninov, Tschaikovsky, Sir Edward Elgar and Rubinstein fill the program.

Saturday Massenet's Overture to "Phedre," part of Bizet's "L'Arlesienne No. 2," suite and music by Wagner, Gounod, Tschaikovsky and Puccini diversify a popular program.

It is true that many of the chosen pieces are to the musician "chestnuts," things for which his liking was long since exhausted by too frequent and too indiscriminate performance. It is true, too, that Beethoven is not often played at the Pops, and Bach never, although the allegretto from the Seventh symphony, the andante from the Fifth, and the first movement of the Pastoral Symphony would probably prove popular with the audiences. Excerpts from "Don Giovanni," and from "The Marriage of Figaro" would be worth trying. Minor classics overlooked by Mr Jacchia include the Waltz from one of Volkmann's "Serenades for Strings" which still keeps his fame alive. But, all these things apart, the educative value of these concerts to the regular and irregular attendants is obviously great.

Heaven forbid that anyone should go to the Pops to be educated, though! The inherent tendency of education to become dull, correct, pedantic, instead of carefree, informal, and enthusiastic, would soon kill the concerts if people began to go to them conscientiously.

GLOBE-MAY.21

THE POPS FLOURISH

Mr. Jacchia's Pop programmes for the coming fourth week of these concerts include, for Monday, such favorites as the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Finale of "Scheherazade," and Chabrier's "Espana"; for Tuesday, the Overtures to "Tannhauser" and "Sakuntala"; for Wednesday, the overtures to Verdi's "Force of Destiny" and Wagner's "Rienzi" and Liszt's Second Hungarian Rhapsody; Thursday, the "William Tell" Overture, the Finale of Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, the "Blue Danube" Waltz and the "Ride of the Valkyries; Friday, a harp solo by Alfred Holy, the "Lohengrin" Fantasia and Tschaikovsky's "Marche Slave"; Saturday, a popular programme, including the "1812 Overture," "Eili, Eili" and Bizet's "l'Arlesienne" Suite.

Simmons College will celebrate at the Pops on Tuesday, the 23d, and sing a group of songs. The Women's City Club and others will be represented this week. But this custom does not interfere in any way with the accessibility of all Pops nights to the public, seats in all locations being generally available.

POP CONDUCTOR NATURALIZED

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the "Pop" Concerts at Symphony Hall and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music, became an American citizen this morning when he took the oath of allegiance in the United States District Court. Mr. Jacchia, who is now conducting the "Pops" for the sixth season, was born in Pesaro, Italy, in 1875. As a pupil of Mascagni he toured America with that artist about twenty years ago, and subsequently conducted opera in Italy and in Montreal, Canada. In 1914 he became conductor of the Century Theatre orchestra in New York, and a year later was conductor of the Boston National Opera Company for one year. Since that time he has resided in Boston.

AGIDE JACCHIA IS NOW U. S. CITIZEN

Honored When He Conducts First Pop Concert as American

The Pops symphony orchestra, under direction of Concertmaster Jacques Hoffman, greeted their conductor, Agide Jacchia, with "The Star Spangled Banner" last night, when he stepped on the stage of Symphony Hall to conduct his first concert as an American citizen.

Mr. Jacchia has been a permanent resident of this country since 1914, and previous to that date he had visited America several times as conductor of various opera companies, first coming here with Mascagni's company. After further activities in Italy he again toured the United States, Central America and Canada with the Milan Opera Company.

He conducted Italian opera in New York at the Academy of Music in 1909, at the Century Theatre in 1914 and joined the Boston National Opera Company for the season of 1915-1916. In Boston he is known not only as conductor of the Pop concerts, but also as founder and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music and as conductor of the Cecilia Society.

He was born in 1875 in Pesaro, Italy, where he was graduated as a young man from the Conservatory of Music, after studying under Mascagni. His wife, whose stage name is Esther Ferrabini, and his daughter have made their home in Boston since they came here from Italy two years ago.

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

The Fourth Week of a Series of Concerts Unique in the East—In Boston They Succeed, in Other Cities They Have Failed

THERE is no equivalent in New York to The Pops of Boston, and for years there has been none. In the earlier days of the Madison Square Garden attempts were made there to maintain a similar series of spring and summer concerts. In one venture Mr. Seidl and his orchestra provided the music; in another Mr. Damrosch. All failed—for lack of a regular and sustaining public. A few years ago in Philadelphia, the Association that controls Mr. Stokowski's orchestra set afoot Pop Concerts—and in a fortnight, it was clear that no sufficient public was rallying to them. Chicago, warmly as it regards its orchestra, has no such concerts. Indeed in no city of the Middle West, in cursory recollection, are there summer concerts by a resident or a visiting orchestra.

Seemingly then, from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, there are no Pop Concerts but the Boston Pops. Few cities lack the means to such entertainment; yet all except Boston, lack the inclination. Here, moreover, the favor of the public is assured, increasing rather than diminishing. Some forsaw the end of The Pops when it was no longer possible for listeners to stock their tables with gentle stimulants. Yet nothing happened beyond the usual content. Again the end was at hand when Mr. Jacchia made his programmes of more serious pieces than had been the custom. But again the public gave no sign of displeasure. So have The Pops become an institution alike for those who arrange them and those who enjoy them. With both fortunately, they remain a live institution. Next week, then, the concerts will run usual course—a "special night" here, a "special night" there; new pieces once and again upon the programme; and conductor and orchestra as usual upon their mettle. The bystander has only to wish them a luck—assured

City Club Women To Attend Pops

WOMEN'S CITY CLUB night at the Pop concerts will be held tomorrow at 8:15 o'clock in Symphony Hall. This is one of the occasions when members of the club and their families and friends may meet together and enjoy a program of delightful music. Members should secure their seats at once at the club office.

Countess Helene de Bisping of Poland will be the guest of the club for luncheon on Monday at 1 o'clock and will speak on "Poland."

Mrs. Thomas G. Winter, president of the General Federation of Women's Clubs and one of the four women delegates at the Limitation of Armament Conference at Washington, will be the guest of the club for dinner on Thursday and will speak on "Citizens and Politicians." Tickets may be obtained at the club office.

FINE PROGRAMS FOR POP CONCERTS

There is a certain harmony about the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall—a harmony over and above the strains which come from the Pops Orchestra. This is the blending of music, refreshments and sociable converse. It explains the huge popular success of the Pops, an attraction to be found only in Boston.

Agide Jacchia, Pops conductor, has made a set of programs brimful of interest for the coming week. For Monday, such Pops favorites as the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Finale of "Scheherazade," and Chabrier's "Espana," will be played.

Simmons College will celebrate Tuesday night and sing a group of songs. The Women's Clyt Club and other organizations will also be represented this week. But all Pops nights are open to the public at large.

CLASSICAL MUSIC AT POP CONCERTS

Mr Jacchia, during his five years as conductor of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, has included in his program more of the regular repertory of the Symphony concerts than any of his predecessors ventured upon. "Classical" music, using the term in its everyday rather than its esoteric sense, has made good with a popular audience in a manner not paralleled elsewhere in the musical history of America. The pieces played at the Pops are really chosen by the audience. The conductor plays not what he likes, or what he believes to be the best music, but what the audiences wil lapplaud. If a new number is not cordially applauded the first few times it is given, it is withdrawn as a failure, no matter whether it was composed by Beethoven or by Irving Berlin. Hence when numbers from the regular Symphony concert program win a place for themselves at the Pops they must do it by pleasing the audience, and not the critics.

This willingness of Pops audiences to enjoy and applaud good music is one of the most hopeful signs for the musical future of this city and country observable. Music has in the past appealed to too limited a public in America. It is only now beginning to win its way with the average man, or for that matter with the average woman. Actual listening with enjoyment to great music is worth any amount of reading or attending lectures upon the appreciation of music.

No matter if the people in the Pops audiences have not always a clear or even a confused knowledge of what musical critics and historians have written about the artistic value of the best pieces played there. If they really like Wagner better than Nevin or than Irving Berlin it does not matter whether they have or have not heard that he is commonly considered by the best judges a greater composer.

Supercilious Culture

We have had too much in America of the people who dare not like a piece of music until they have made sure that its composer is prominently mentioned in Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians. There is really more hope in the spontaneous appreciation of less consciously "cultured" individuals. Give the public the best music, without labeling it as good or bad, and one finds public taste not so hopelessly unsound as it seems.

In music, as in other things, a little learning is a dangerous thing. The person with a natural liking for music is too often superciliously tutored in what he should like to be saved until he either rebels and goes in for jazz or meekly rhapsodies over the more tiresome minor works of Beethoven and Bach.

But at the Pops no work is labeled good music, or bad music. It is played because people seem to like it and for no other reason. Yet this week the programs contain a long list of things from the regular Symphony concert repertory.

To particularize, Monday night the Women's City Club and others will hear among other things the Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" of Mendelssohn, the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," an excerpt from one of Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" suites, the finale from Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade," and Chabrier's "Espana," no less than five out of 11 numbers being from the Symphony concert repertory.

Tuesday night Simmons College will hear Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, the overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser," and Berlioz' "Rackoczy March," besides numbers by Liszt, Greig and Bizet. Wednesday Northeastern College will be offered only one number from the Symphony repertory, Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, but there will also be music by Verdi, Liszt, Greig and Schumann.

What Is Played

Thursday Rossini's "William Tell" Overture, Chabrier's "Espana," the Finale from Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, and the Ride of the Valkyries appear on a program also offering numbers by Grieg, Schubert, Sibelius, Saint-Saens and Dvorak (not the "Humoresque," but a "Slavonic Dance").

Friday the "Ranz des Vaches" from Schumann's "Manfred" music, an excerpt from Ippolitov-Ivanov's "Caucassian Sketches," Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, and music by Wagner, Rachmaninov, Tschaikovsky, Sir Edward Elgar and Rubinstein fill the program.

Saturday Massenet's Overture to "Phedre," part of Bizet's "L'Arlesienne No. 2," suite and music by Wagner, Gounod, Tschaikovsky and Puccini diversify a popular program.

It is true that many of the chosen pieces are to the musician "chestnuts," things for which his liking was long since exhausted by too frequent and too indiscriminate performance. It is true, too, that Beethoven is not often played at the Pops, and Bach never, although the allegretto from the Seventh symphony, the andante from the Fifth, and the first movement of the Pastoral Symphony would probably prove popular with the audiences. Excerpts from "Don Giovanni," and from "The Marriage of Figaro" would be worth trying. Minor classics overlooked by Mr Jacchia include the Waltz from one of Volkmann's "Serenades for Strings" which still keeps his fame alive. But, all these things apart, the educative value of these concerts to the regular and irregular attendants is obviously great.

Heaven forbid that anyone should go to the Pops to be educated, though! The inherent tendency of education to become dull, correct, pedantic, instead of carefree, informal, and enthusiastic, would soon kill the concerts if people began to go to them conscientiously.

THE POPS FLOURISH

Mr. Jacchia's Pop programmes for the coming fourth week of these concerts include, for Monday, such favorites as the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Finale of "Scheherazade," and Chabrier's "Espana"; for Tuesday, the Overtures to "Tannhauser" and "Sakuntala"; for Wednesday, the overtures to Verdi's "Force of Destiny" and Wagner's "Rienzi" and Liszt's Second Hungarian Rhapsody; Thursday, the "William Tell" Overture, the Finale of Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, the "Blue Danube" Waltz and the "Ride of the Valkyries; Friday, a harp solo by Alfred Holy, the "Lohengrin" Fantasia and Tschaikovsky's "Marche Slave"; Saturday, a popular programme, including the "1812 Overture," "Eili, Eili" and Bizet's "l'Arlesienne" Suite.

Simmons College will celebrate at the Pops on Tuesday, the 23d, and sing a group of songs. The Women's City Club and others will be represented this week. But this custom does not interfere in any way with the accessibility of all Pops nights to the public, seats in all locations being generally available.

POP CONDUCTOR NATURALIZED

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the "Pop" Concerts at Symphony Hall and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music, became an American citizen this morning when he took the oath of allegiance in the United States District Court. Mr. Jacchia, who is now conducting the "Pops" for the sixth season, was born in Pesaro, Italy, in 1875. As a pupil of Mascagni he toured America with that artist about twenty years ago, and subsequently conducted opera in Italy and in Montreal, Canada. In 1914 he became conductor of the Century Theatre orchestra in New York, and a year later was conductor of the Boston National Opera Company for one year. Since that time he has resided in Boston.

AGIDE JACCHIA IS NOW U. S. CITIZEN

Honored When He Conducts First Pop Concert as American

The Pops symphony orchestra, under direction of Concertmaster Jacques Hoffman, greeted their conductor, Agide Jacchia, with "The Star Spangled Banner" last night, when he stepped on the stage of Symphony Hall to conduct his first concert as an American citizen.

Mr. Jacchia has been a permanent resident of this country since 1914, and previous to that date he had visited America several times as conductor of various opera companies, first coming here with Mascagni's company. After further activities in Italy he again toured the United States, Central America and Canada with the Milan Opera Company.

He conducted Italian opera in New York at the Academy of Music in 1909, at the Century Theatre in 1914 and joined the Boston National Opera Company for the season of 1915-1916. In Boston he is known not only as conductor of the Pop concerts, but also as founder and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music and as conductor of the Cecilia Society.

He was born in 1875 in Pesaro, Italy, where he was graduated as a young man from the Conservatory of Music, after studying under Mascagni. His wife, whose stage name is Esther Ferrabini, and his daughter have made their home in Boston since they came here from Italy two years ago.

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

The Fourth Week of a Series of Concerts Unique in the East—In Boston They Succeed, in Other Cities They Have Failed

THERE is no equivalent in New York to The Pops of Boston, and for years there has been none. In the earlier days of the Madison Square Garden attempts were made there to maintain a similar series of spring and summer concerts. In one venture Mr. Seidl and his orchestra provided the music; in another Mr. Damrosch. All failed—for lack of a regular and sustaining public. A few years ago in Philadelphia, the Association that controls Mr. Stokowski's orchestra set afoot Pop Concerts—and in a fortnight, it was clear that no sufficient public was rallying to them. Chicago, warmly as it regards its orchestra, has no such concerts. Indeed in no city of the Middle West, in cursory recollection, are there summer concerts by a resident or a visiting orchestra.

Seemingly then, from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, there are no Pop Concerts but the Boston Pops. Few cities lack the means to such entertainment; yet all except Boston, lack the inclination. Here moreover, the favor of the public is assured, increasing rather than diminishing. Some forsaw the end of The Pops when it was no longer possible for listeners to stock their tables with gentle stimulants. Yet nothing happened beyond the usual content. Again the end was at hand when Mr. Jacchia made his programmes of more serious pieces than had been the custom. But again the public gave no sign of displeasure. So have The Pops become an institution alike for those who arrange them and those who enjoy them. With both fortunately, they remain a live institution. Next week, then, the concerts will run usual course—a "special night" here, a "special night" there; new pieces once and again upon the programme; and conductor and orchestra as usual upon their mettle. The bystander has only to wish them a luck—assured

There is a certain harmony about the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall—a harmony over and above the strains which come from the Pops Orchestra. This is the blending of music, refreshments and sociable converse. It explains the huge popular success of the Pops, an attraction to be found only in Boston.

Agide Jacchia, Pops conductor, has made a set of programs brimful of interest for the coming week. For Monday, such Pops favorites as the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Finale of "Scheherazade," and Chabrier's "Espana," will be played.

Simmons College will celebrate Tuesday night and sing a group of songs. The Women's Ciyt Club and other organizations will also be represented this week. But all Pops nights are open to the public at large.

HERALD MAY 21

CLASSICAL MUSIC AT POP CONCERTS

Mr Jacchia, during his five years as conductor of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, has included in his program more of the regular repertory of the Symphony concerts than any of his predecessors ventured upon. "Classical" music, using the term in its everyday rather than its esoteric sense, has made good with a popular audience in a manner not paralleled elsewhere in the musical history of America. The pieces played at the Pops are really chosen by the audience. The conductor plays not what he likes, or what he believes to be the best music, but what the audiences wil lapplaud. If a new number is not cordially applauded the first few times it is given, it is withdrawn as a failure, no matter whether it was composed by Beethoven or by Irving Berlin. Hence when numbers from the regular Symphony concert program win a place for themselves at the Pops they must do it by pleasing the audience, and not the critics.

This willingness of Pops audiences to enjoy and applaud good music is one of the most hopeful signs for the musical future of this city and country observable. Music has in the past appealed to too limited a public in America. It is only now beginning to win its way with the average man, or for that matter with the average woman. Actual listening with enjoyment to great music is worth any amount of reading or attending lectures upon the appreciation of music.

No matter if the people in the Pops audiences have not always a clear or even a confused knowledge of what musical critics and historians have written about the artistic value of the best pieces played there. If they really like Wagner better than Nevin or than Irving Berlin it does not matter whether they have or have not heard that he is commonly considered by the best judges a greater composer.

Supercilious Culture

We have had too much in America of the people who dare not like a piece of music until they have made sure that its composer is prominently mentioned in Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians. There is really more hope in the spontaneous appreciation of less consciously "cultured" individuals. Give the public the best music, without labeling it as good or bad, and one finds public taste not so hopelessly unsound as it seems.

In music, as in other things, a little learning is a dangerous thing. The person with a natural liking for music is too often superciliously tutored in what he should like to be saved until he either rebels and goes in for jazz or meekly rhapsodies over the more tiresome minor works of Beethoven and Bach.

But at the Pops no work is labeled good music, or bad music. It is played because people seem to like it and for no other reason. Yet this week the programs contain a long list of things from the regular Symphony concert repertory.

To particularize, Monday night the Women's City Club and others will hear among other things the Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" of Mendelssohn, the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," an excerpt from one of Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" suites, the finale from Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade," and Chabrier's "Espana," no less than five out of 11 numbers being from the Symphony concert repertory.

Tuesday night Simmons College will hear Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, the overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser," and Berlioz' "Rackoczy March," besides numbers by Liszt, Greig and Bizet. Wednesday Northeastern College will be offered only one number from the Symphony repertory, Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, but there will also be music by Verdi, Liszt, Greig and Schumann.

What Is Played

Thursday Rossini's "William Tell" Overture, Chabrier's "Espana," the Finale from Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, and the Ride of the Valkyries appear on a program also offering numbers by Grieg, Schubert, Sibelius, Saint-Saens and Dvorak (not the "Humoresque," but a "Slavonic Dance").

Friday the "Ranz des Vaches" from Schumann's "Manfred" music, an excerpt from Ippolitov-Ivanov's "Caucassian Sketches," Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, and music by Wagner, Rachmaninov, Tschaikovsky, Sir Edward Elgar and Rubinstein fill the program.

Saturday Massenet's Overture to "Phedre," part of Bizet's "L'Arlesienne No. 2," suite and music by Wagner, Gounod, Tschaikovsky and Puccini diversify a popular program.

It is true that many of the chosen pieces are to the musician "chestnuts," things for which his liking was long since exhausted by too frequent and too indiscriminate performance. It is true, too, that Beethoven is not often played at the Pops, and Bach never, although the allegretto from the Seventh symphony, the andante from the Fifth, and the first movement of the Pastoral Symphony would probably prove popular with the audiences. Excerpts from "Don Giovanni," and from "The Marriage of Figaro" would be worth trying. Minor classics overlooked by Mr Jacchia include the Waltz from one of Volkmann's "Serenades for Strings" which still keeps his fame alive. But, all these things apart, the educative value of these concerts to the regular and irregular attendants is obviously great.

Heaven forbid that anyone should go to the Pops to be educated, though! The inherent tendency of education to become dull, correct, pedantic, instead of carefree, informal, and enthusiastic, would soon kill the concerts if people began to go to them conscientiously.

THE POPS FLOURISH

Mr. Jacchia's Pop programmes for the coming fourth week of these concerts include, for Monday, such favorites as the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Finale of "Scheherazade," and Chabrier's "Espana"; for Tuesday, the Overtures to "Tannhauser" and "Sakuntala"; for Wednesday, the overtures to Verdi's "Force of Destiny" and Wagner's "Rienzi" and Liszt's Second Hungarian Rhapsody; Thursday, the "William Tell" Overture, the Finale of Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, the "Blue Danube" Waltz and the "Ride of the Valkyries; Friday, a harp solo by Alfred Holy, the "Lohengrin" Fantasia and Tschaikovsky's "Marche Slave"; Saturday, a popular programme, including the "1812 Overture," "Eili, Eili" and Bizet's "l'Arlesienne" Suite.

Simmons College will celebrate at the Pops on Tuesday, the 23d, and sing a group of songs. The Women's City Club and others will be represented this week. But this custom does not interfere in any way with the accessibility of all Pops nights to the public, seats in all locations being generally available.

JACCHIA BECOMES AMERICAN CITIZEN

Pupil of Mascagni Resident of This Country Since 1914

In recognition of the admission to citizenship in the United States of Agide Jacchia, leader of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall for the last six years, which took place in the United States District Court yesterday morning, Mr Jacchia's appearance on the stage of Symphony Hall last night was greeted by the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner."

AGIDE JACCHIA.

As Mr Jacchia stepped on the stage to conduct his first concert as an American citizen, Concertmaster Jacques Hoffman mounted the conductor's platform, leading the playing of the National anthem, with the entire orchestra standing. The large audience applauded with the warmest enthusiasm.

A permanent resident of this country since 1914, Mr Jacchia's affiliations go even further back, for he had visited America several times before that as conductor of various opera companies.

Mr Jacchia has been celebrated as a conductor of opera ever since, as a young man, he graduate from the Conservatory of Music at Pesaro, Italy, where he was born in 1875, and where he studied under Mascagni. He first came to America as conductor of Mascagni's opera company, and, after activities in Italy, he traveled through the United States, Central America and Canada with the Milan Opera Company. He conducted Italian opera in New York at the Academy of Music and at the Century Theatre in 1909 and 1914, respectively, conducting also four years of opera in Montreal. He joined the Boston National Opera Company for the st 1916. In Boston he is kno only as conductor of the Pop con but also as conductor of the Cecil ciety.

Mr Jacchia's wife, whose stage n is Esther Ferrabini, and their daug have made Boston their home since t came here from Italy two years ago.

Pupil of Mascagni Resident of This Country Since 1914

In recognition of the admission to citizenship in the United States of Agide Jacchia, leader of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall for the last six years, which took place in the United States District Court yesterday morning, Mr Jacchia's appearance on the stage of Symphony Hall last night was greeted by the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner."

AGIDE JACCHIA.

As Mr Jacchia stepped on the stage to conduct his first concert as an American citizen, Concertmaster Jacques Hoffman mounted the conductor's platform, leading the playing of the National anthem, with the entire orchestra standing. The large audience applauded with the warmest enthusiasm.

A permanent resident of this country since 1914, Mr Jacchia's affiliations go even further back, for he had visited America several times before that as conductor of various opera companies.

Mr Jacchia has been celebrated as a conductor of opera ever since, as a young man, he graduate from the Conservatory of Music at Pesaro, Italy, where he was born in 1875, and where he studied under Mascagni. He first came to America as conductor of Mascagni's opera company, and, after activities in Italy, he traveled through the United States, Central America and Canada with the Milan Opera Company. He conducted Italian opera in New York at the Academy of Music and at the Century Theatre in 1909 and 1914, respectively, conducting also four years of opera in Montreal. He joined the Boston National Opera Company for the se 1915-1916. In Boston he is kno only as conductor of the Pop con but also as conductor of the Cecil. ciety.

Mr Jacchia's wife, whose stage n is Esther Ferrabini, and their daugh have made Boston their home since t came here from Italy two years ago.

ORGANIZE YOUR "POPS" PARTY NOW

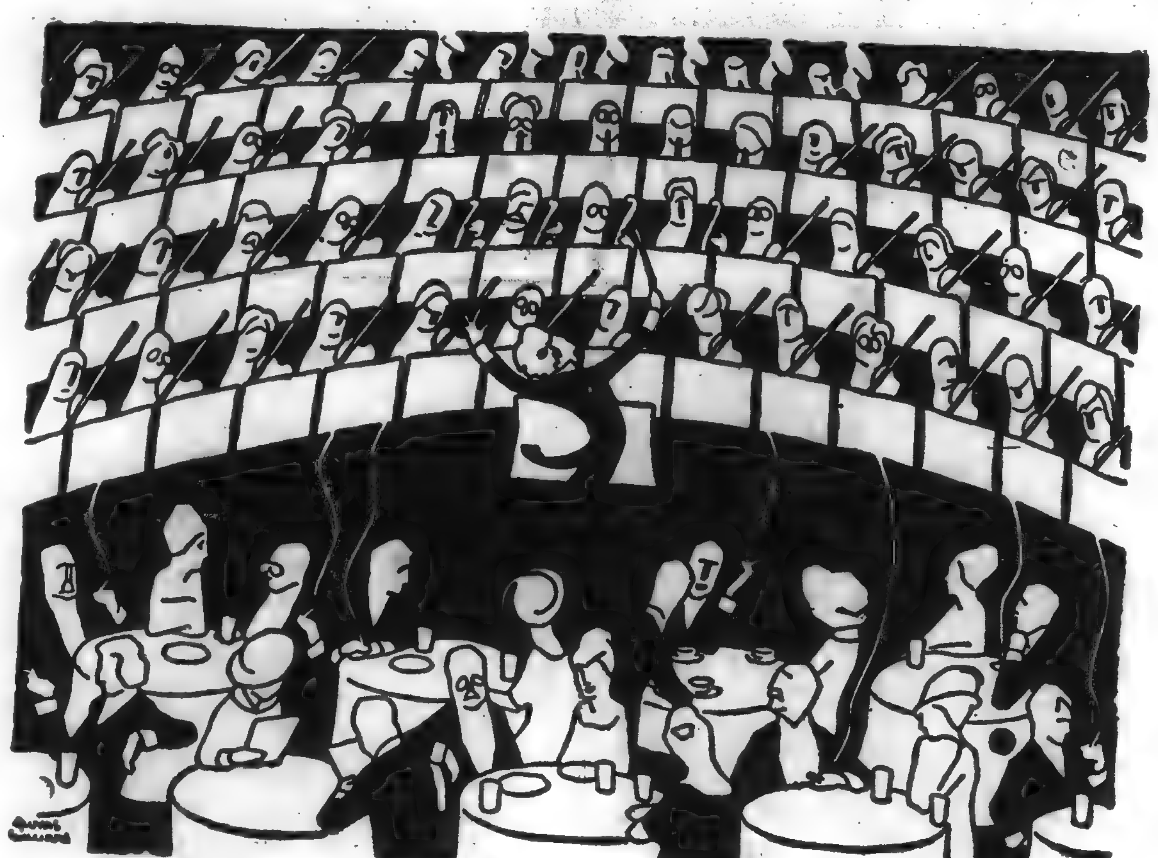
Girls,' Women's and Men's Clubs Hot After Best Ticket Selling Honors---Filene Night June 28 at Symphony Pop Concert to be Biggest Mid-Summer Event

Harmony, good fellowship, co-operation—all thrown to the four winds!!!

Keen rivalry, good sportsmanship, and individualism with the Men's, Women's and Girls' Clubs in battle royal will hold sway from TODAY until WEDNESDAY, JUNE 21!!!

The heavy barrage of the Boston Symphony Pops tickets has been laid down from the F. C. A. Office and the three big Clubs are out for the high honor of selling the most tickets for the FILENE NIGHT at the POPS, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 28!!!

Presidents Francis Dutch, Mrs. Mary V. Norton and Miss Kit Barry are to lead their valiant forces for the next three weeks with the whole store organization as the battle-ground so F. C. A. members may be "hit" for the price of Pops tickets almost anywhere, anyhow, anytime.



Boston Symphony Orchestra in Action, as Seen by Ex-Harvard Lampoon Artist

The F. C. A. Clubs have 1,000 seats with half of the Symphony Hall floor reserved. "Dad" Cory is commander-in-chief of the F. C. A. forces and he is banking on all the clubs to make a hole in the F. C. A. line so that the old enemy "Can't-Be-Done" will be driven to the wall and complete victory hailed Wednesday night, June 28th, when the Association members will flock to Symphony for the first big night ever scheduled at the Pops by a retail store organization.

The Club Presidents will be assisted by the other officers and entertainment committees in the important engagement and the rallying cry of the three groups will be "Don't miss a single one and sell 'em all!"

The ticket-sellers will have an exchange slip upon which will be written the name of the purchaser, the number of tickets wanted and the price, which will be exchanged in the F. C. A. Office for the Pops tickets. Charts of the floor and the first balcony will show F. C. A. members just where they are going to "camp" FILENE NIGHT. Harry Chapin will have charge of the reserved seat sale. The ticket-seller will also keep a stub record of their sale and all tickets are numbered so both purchaser and seller are protected.

Many suggestions have been made regarding the reservation of sections of the floor for parties made upon the floors or in departments, and NOW IS THE TIME TO ORGANIZE YOUR PARTY. Don't wait until the last minute to buy your ticket. Buy your tickets NOW so that you will be sure to have them, and buy enough to organize your party. Then come to the F. C. A. Office at the EARLIEST POSSIBLE TIME and make your selection of seats.

Four people can reserve a table on the floor and if the persons engaging the table wish to have five or six seats at the table, such arrangements can be made. The floor chairs are $1 each. The first balcony seats range from 50c. to $1. The first row around the entire balcony is $1 per, the next two rows are 75c. and the remainder of the balcony is 50c. per ticket.

The place Filene talent will have on the program depends largely upon the response of F. C. A. members to the ticket sale. The F. C. A. can hardly expect the Pops management to give much consideration to our own excellent talent unless Filene's employes compose the larger part of the audience.

POPS POPING

The Pops this season are vying with "Sally" in capacity audiences. The "special night" business has grown to the extent that there are few nights when some society or school does not attend in a body. Jacchia, the conductor of the big band, has developed tremendously since he first assumed the baton in Symphony Hall and can now conduct a Strauss waltz with a delightful Viennese lilt to it as skillfully as he can bang out a bit potpourri of Italian operatic airs or an excerpt from a Tschaikowsky symphony.

Jacchia is fast making a reputation as a composer and an arranger. I heard an orchestra arrangement by him of the Yiddish classic, "Elli, Elli," in which the melody was given to the trumpet and which was enormously effective at the Pops the other night.

The following numbers will be played at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

"Entrance of Guests into the Wartburg,' "Tannhauser" Wagner
Overture to "Phedre".....Massenet
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," Strauss
Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet' Gounod

POP CONCERTS

The Pop concerts at Symphony Hall which, running every night except Sunday, are now in their fifth week, have had the largest attendance and the most pronounced popular success since this now venerable institution began in 1885.

Agide Jacchia and his Symphony Orchestra of 75 musicians are providing fine programs and performances of a quality not to be matched elsewhere at this season of the year. Tonight will be Harvard night, with numbers by the Harvard Glee Club. Thursday will bring the "Lohengrin" Prelude, Dvorak's "Largo" and the "March of the Little Lead Soldiers"; Friday, the "Peer Gynt" suite, "1812" Overture, and Chabrier's Espana. Saturday will bring the "Rakoczy" march, "Faust" fantasia, Second Rhapsody of Liszt, Volga Bargemen's song, "Procession of the Sardar." These are but a few of many interesting numbers.

HARVARD MEN HAVE BIG NIGHT AT POPS

Pres Lowell Attends Annual Musical Event

Harvard graduates and undergraduates, their families, friends and all supporters of the university across the Charles filled Symphony Hall to the last seat last evening, when that annual institution, "Harvard Night," was observed at the Pops.

An excellent program, with a liberal admixture of Harvard music, was provided by Conductor Jacchia, while the Harvard Glee Club, under the leadership of Dr Archibald T. Davison, contributed a goodly share to the success of the evening and received a regular ovation from the big audience.

Pres A. Lawrence Lowell of Harvard, accompanied by Mrs Lowell, was seated at one of the floor tables near the stage, and a number of well known members of the Harvard faculty, with their families, were scattered throughout the audience.

The Crimson paper banners, which used to be an inseparable part of every Harvard night at the Pops—and which always disappeared in the most miraculous manner after the concerts were under way—are no longer to be seen, but the word "H-A-R-V-A-R-D," in crimson letters, is still emblazoned across the pipes of the big organ.

Opening with Strube's stirring march, "Cruiser Harvard," the program proceeded through the ever-popular overture to Thomas' "Figaro," and Leoni's "L'Oracolo," to Florent Schmitt's "Chant de Guerre," splendidly sung by the Glee Club, to the accompaniment of the Pops' orchestra. A tenor solo in this number was beautifully given by Joseph F. Lautner.

Later in the evening the Glee Club, unaccompanied, sang a group of songs with excellent effect, opening with Paine's "Harvard Hymn," and concluding with the tempestuous "Let Their Celestial Concerts All Unite," from Handel's "Samson." The Glee Club was encored several times.

The audience found evident delight in the playing, as encores of such typical Harvard pieces as Densmore's "Veritas," while the concert concluded with "Fair Harvard," at the first strains of which the entire audience rose to its feet.

Pres Lowell Attends Annual Musical Event

Harvard graduates and undergraduates, their families, friends and all supporters of the university across the Charles filled Symphony Hall to the last seat last evening, when that annual institution, "Harvard Night," was observed at the Pops.

An excellent program, with a liberal admixture of Harvard music, was provided by Conductor Jacchia, while the Harvard Glee Club, under the leadership of Dr Archibald T. Davison, contributed a goodly share to the success of the evening and received a regular ovation from the big audience.

Pres A. Lawrence Lowell of Harvard, accompanied by Mrs Lowell, was seated at one of the floor tables near the stage, and a number of well known members of the Harvard faculty, with their families, were scattered throughout the audience.

The Crimson paper banners, which used to be an inseparable part of every Harvard night at the Pops—and which always disappeared in the most miraculous manner after the concerts were under way—are no longer to be seen, but the word "H-A-R-V-A-R-D," in crimson letters, is still emblazoned across the pipes of the big organ.

Opening with Strube's stirring march, "Cruiser Harvard," the program proceeded through the ever-popular overture to Thomas' "Figaro," and Leoni's L'Oracolo," to Florent Schmitt's "Chant de Guerre," splendidly sung by the Glee Club, to the accompaniment of the Pops' orchestra. A tenor solo in this number was beautifully given by Joseph F. Lautner.

Later in the evening the Glee Club, unaccompanied, sang a group of songs with excellent effect, opening with Paine's "Harvard Hymn," and concluding with the tempestuous "Let Their Celestial Concerts All Unite," from Handel's "Samson." The Glee Club was encored several times.

The audience found evident delight in the playing, as encores of such typical Harvard pieces as Densmore's "Veritas," while the concert concluded with "Fair Harvard," at the first strains of which the entire audience rose to its feet.

MANY NEW WORKS AT POPS

The importance of "The Pops" to American composers for orchestra is growing tremendously since Agide Jacchia has taken control of the band.

Between the Symphony and the street band there was no middle ground for the instrumental composer in this country. A person either wrote such an imposing work that it was played by Symphony orchestras, or he wrote something so popular in character it was played by bands and dance orchestras.

Under the patronage of the Pops, orchestra writing of marceaux for orchestra is attracting many clever young composers. Jacchia introduces such works as encores occasionally, and if they please, finally programs them. Thus the "Dirge," by Irma Seydel, went on as an encore number several times and is now being programmed. Miss Seydel would probably never have written this brilliant little piece of orchestral composition if it had not been for her knowledge that there was a Pops orchestra to play it.

Jacchia himself is composing tune[illegible] [illegible]ng many interesting pieces for orchestra. His biggest hit is the arranegment for full orchestra of the Jewish air, "Eili Eili," which is now being demanded at every performance. It is a noble and dignified melody and is enshrined in a beautiful setting.

Mr. Brennon's policy is encouraging special nights has resulted in the fact that about two-thirds of all performances are now patronized by organizations, societies, stores and clubs, who attend to the number of thousands, and help make this the most prosperous year the Pops have ever had.

Novelties at the "Pops"

The programs for this season's "Pops," as arranged by Agide Jacchia, their conductor, have been of unusual artistic interest. That of last Saturday evening was no exception. Besides the usual familiar pieces it included the Intermezzo from Puccini's "Suor Angelica" and Mr. Jacchia's own arrangement of three Afro-American folk songs—"Bury Me in de Eas'"; "Musieu Bainjo"; and "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen." Puccini's Intermezzo is a delicate and expressive bit of writing, well suited to concert performance. It is melodious but not in the flamboyant style so often affected by this composer. The harmonies are quasi-Gregorian in character and the piece as a whole stirs the imagination as operatic excerpts taken from their setting seldom do.

Of late it has been somewhat the fashion to dress up folk songs and old melodies of like character in modern harmonies. Cyril Scott, Arnold Bax, John Ireland and others have attempted to impart new life to these old tunes. Similar transcriptions of Afro-American folk songs have also been made. After all is said in favor of these transcriptions the fact remains that they are ineffective. The forced wedding of modern harmonies to these simple, unsophisticated melodies is never satisfying and can only please as a harmonic tour de force, remarkable for its cleverness alone. Not so with Mr. Jacchia's three transcriptions played last Saturday. In them he shows what a well-grounded musician can do with these tunes without recourse to the queer or extravagant. His harmonizations are pleasing, well chosen and above all maintain the simple folk spirit of the melodies. The orchestration, it is perhaps needless to say, as Mr. Jacchia's skill in this matter is already well known, is excellent. Among the more familiar pieces on the program the spirited playing of Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody should be noted. It speaks well for the discipline of the orchestra that it was able to give so clear and spontaneous a rendering of this difficult composition after a long and arduous season.

MANY NEW WORKS AT POPS

The importance of "The Pops" to American composers for orchestra is growing tremendously since Agide Jacchia has taken control of the band.

Between the Symphony and the street band there was no middle ground for the instrumental composer in this country. A person either wrote such an imposing work that it was played by Symphony orchestras, or he wrote something so popular in character it was played by bands and dance orchestras.

Under the patronage of the Pops, orchestra writing of marceaux for orchestra is attracting many clever young composers. Jacchia introduces such works as encores occasionally, and if they please, finally programs them. Thus the "Dirge," by Irma Seydel, went on as an encore number several times and is now being programmed. Miss Seydel would probably never have written this brilliant little piece of orchestral composition if it had not been for her knowledge that there was a Pops orchestra to play it.

Jacchia himself is composing tunefully, and arranging many interesting pieces for orchestra. His biggest hit is the arranegment for full orchestra of the Jewish air, "Elli Eili," which is now being demanded at every performance. It is a noble and dignified melody and is enshrined in a beautiful setting.

Mr. Brennon's policy is encouraging special nights has resulted in the fact that about two-thirds of all performances are now patronized by organizations, societies, stores and clubs, who attend to the number of thousands, and help make this the most prosperous year the Pops have ever had.

The programs for this season's "Pops," as arranged by Agide Jacchia, their conductor, have been of unusual artistic interest. That of last Saturday evening was no exception. Besides the usual familiar pieces it included the Intermezzo from Puccini's "Suor Angelica" and Mr. Jacchia's own arrangement of three Afro-American folk songs—"Bury Me in de Eas'"; "Musieu Bainjo"; and "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen." Puccini's Intermezzo is a delicate and expressive bit of writing, well suited to concert performance. It is melodious but not in the flamboyant style so often affected by this composer. The harmonies are quasi-Gregorian in character and the piece as a whole stirs the imagination as operatic excerpts taken from their setting seldom do.

Of late it has been somewhat the fashion to dress up folk songs and old melodies of like character in modern harmonies. Cyril Scott, Arnold Bax, John Iréland and others have attempted to impart new life to these old tunes. Similar transcriptions of Afro-American folk songs have also been made. After all is said in favor of these transcriptions the fact remains that they are ineffective. The forced wedding of modern harmonies to these simple, unsophisticated melodies is never satisfying and can only please as a harmonic tour de force, remarkable for its cleverness alone. Not so with Mr. Jacchia's three transcriptions played last Saturday. In them he shows what a well-grounded musician can do with these tunes without recourse to the queer or extravagant. His harmonizations are pleasing, well chosen and above all maintain the simple folk spirit of the melodies. The orchestration, it is perhaps needless to say, as Mr. Jacchia's skill in this matter is already well known, is excellent. Among the more familiar pieces on the program the spirited playing of Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody should be noted. It speaks well for the discipline of the orchestra that it was able to give so clear and spontaneous a rendering of this difficult composition after a long and arduous season.

POPS TO PL BOSTON GIRL'S COMPOSITION

Irma Seydel, one of the best known American girl violinists and daughter of one of the bass violinists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has written a piece of descriptive music entitled "The Dirge," which has already been played several times as an encore by Mr. Jacchia at the Pops, but which will be programmed for the first time Saturday evening.

WEIRDNESS APPEALS.

The work has caught music lovers by its weirdness and its queer coloring. Miss Seydel, herself, explains it in this fashion:

"'The Dirge' is supposed to portray a cortege in the desert. First one hears the thud of footsteps of many men and animals upon the hard ground, then a distant drumbeat, then the sound of voices in a funeral chant. The procession approaches, the footsteps, the melancholy wail and the drumbeat grow louder, louder; then diminish gradually and die in the distance. The desert is again wrapped in silence.

MELODY TEN YEAHS OLD.

"The harmonic basis of 'The Dirge' is the chord of E minor, from which the accompaniment does not once deviate. The theme is repeated four times, each time in a higher octave.

"This melody was written nearly ten years ago, with no plan of scale structure but only a striving after weirdness of intervals, with oriental color dominating. Afterwards, quite with the exception of three notes, the theme adheres to the primitive pentatonic (five tone) scale."

POP CONCERTS

This is the thirty-seventh season of the historical institution which is unique to Boston and so very much Boston's own. Night after night the "Pops" are surpassing all records in the popularity of the programmes, quality of performance, and the general atmosphere of a "lively time".

One very potent reason for the eminent popularity of the Pop Concerts lies in the personality, the skill and the irrespressible enthusiasm of Agide Jacchia, the celebrated "Pops" conductor of six seasons. He has to do his bidding a superb orchestra of 75 musicians; in short, a full-sized symphony orchestra which could not be matched in this or any other city in the summer season.

THREE WEEKS MORE OF THE POPS

Only three more weeks remain of what is now assured to be the largest season the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall have ever had.

For Monday of the coming week (June 19), Boston University has taken over the Pop Concert, but all other nights are open to the public.

The program for Tuesday will include overtures to "Sakuntala" and "Tannhauser," the "Peer Gynt" suite, Rachmaninov's prelude, Volga Bargemen's Song, Strauss's Waltz, "Artists' Life," and the Bacchanale from Saint-Saens' "Samson." For Wednesday may be mentioned the Rakoczy March, "Butterfly" Fantasia, Liszt's First Rhapsody, "1812" Overture; for Thursday the "Blue Danube" Waltz; "Carmen" Fantasia, Second Rhapsody of Liszt, "Eili, Eili," Overture to "Rienzi," and the "Espana" Waltz; for Friday "Pomp and Circumstance," "Finlandia," and the Marche Slave. For Saturday, "Aida" Fantasia, Finale of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, "Reve Angelique," Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris," Jacchia's arrangement of the negro folk songs, and the "Ride of the Valkyries."

THE SAMENESS OF THE POPS

To the Editor of the Transcript:

I was glad to see a note in the Transcript relative to the Pop Concerts. I attended the Pops three nights the first week of the concerts, and heard four repetitions. The second week I attended one concert, when there were five repetitions of pieces played on the other three nights. The third week I went once again. On this occasion I heard no less than seven pieces—nearly half of all the pieces that were played—that I had heard on the previous four nights. Not only so, but several pieces were second or even third repetitions. After this experience, one is about ready to stay at home.

MASONS TO HAVE NIGHT AT POPS

Boston Club Has Set June 27 as the Date

The Boston Masonic Club will have a night at the "Pops" Tuesday, June 27. The conductor of the orchestra, Agide Jacchia, is a member of Euclid lodge, as are 10 others, and fully half of the orchestra are Masons. An interesting program has been arranged, and it is anticipated the craft will be well represented.

One of the star events in the calendar of the Masonic Club will be the burning of the second mortgage, which will take place Saturday evening, with appropriate ceremonies. There will be singing, an address by the Hon. Joseph E. Warner and Treasurer Rogers will turn over the mortgage to President Terhune. Dancing will be in order to close the festivities of the evening.

Announcement is made of the midsummer night's festival at the clubhouse, Thursday, July 13, at 8:15 P. M. The event promises to be one of the most interesting in the history of the club. Among the entertainers there will be Miss Gertrude Crosby, in imitations and light opera selections; Miss Ruth Brett Zinn, songs in costume; Mrs. Mary Hobson, contralto; Miss Mildred Harron, lyric soprano; Miss Margaret Humphrey, fancy dancing; Mr. Eddie Deering, grotesque and fancy dancing; Acacia quartet, consisting of Walter Jackson, first tenor; Paul G. Weden, second tenor; Silas J. Parker, first bass; Clarence Merrill, second bass; the Mid-Summer Girls' Trio, Miss Ruth Austin, violin; Miss Catherine Fallon, 'cello; Miss Mildred Harron, piano, and the Boston Masonic Club Trio, Miss Alfreda M. Call, violin; Miss Eunice Condon, 'cello, and Miss Elsie C. Wright, piano. The entertainment will be followed by dancing under the direction of Bro. Roscoe L. Davidson.

POPS TO PLAY BOSTON GIRL'S COMPOSITION

Irma Seydel, one of the best known American girl violinists and daughter of one of the bass violinists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has written a piece of descriptive music entitled "The Dirge," which has already been played several times as an encore by Mr. Jacchia at the Pops, but which will be programmed for the first time Saturday evening.

WEIRDNESS APPEALS.

The work has caught music lovers by its weirdness and its queer coloring. Miss Seydel, herself, explains it in this fashion:

"'The Dirge' is supposed to portray a cortege in the desert. First one hears the thud of footsteps of many men and animals upon the hard ground, then a distant drumbeat, then the sound of voices in a funeral chant. The procession approaches, the footsteps, the melancholy wail and the drumbeat grow louder, louder, then diminish gradually and die in the distance. The desert is again wrapped in silence.

MELODY TEN YEAHS OLD.

"The harmonic basis of 'The Dirge' is the chord of E minor, from which the accompaniment does not once deviate. The theme is repeated four times, each time in a higher octave.

"This melody was written nearly ten years ago, with no plan of scale structure but only a striving after weirdness of intervals, with oriental color dominating. Afterwards, quite recently in fact, I discovered that with the exception of three notes, the theme adheres to the primitive pentatonic (five tone) scale."

Noted Violinist Who Has Composed "The Dirge"

MASONS TO HAVE NIGHT AT POPS

Boston Club Has Set June 27 as the Date

The Boston Masonic Club will have a night at the "Pops" Tuesday, June 27. The conductor of the orchestra, Agide Jacchia, is a member of Euclid lodge, as are 10 others, and fully half of the orchestra are Masons. An interesting program has been arranged, and it is anticipated the craft will be well represented.

One of the star events in the calendar of the Masonic Club will be the burning of the second mortgage, which will take place Saturday evening, with appropriate ceremonies. There will be singing, an address by the Hon. Joseph E. Warner and Treasurer Rogers will turn over the mortgage to President Terhune. Dancing will be in order to close the festivities of the evening.

Announcement is made of the midsummer night's festival at the clubhouse, Thursday, July 13, at 8:15 P. M. The event promises to be one of the most interesting in the history of the club. Among the entertainers there will be Miss Gertrude Crosby, in imitations and light opera selections; Miss Ruth Brett Zinn, songs in costume; Mrs. Mary Hobson, contralto; Miss Mildred Harron, lyric soprano; Miss Margaret Humphrey, fancy dancing; Mr. Eddie Deering, grotesque and fancy dancing; Acacia quartet, consisting of Walter Jackson, first tenor; Paul G. Weden, second tenor; Silas J. Parker, first bass; Clarence Merrill, second bass; the Mid-Summer Girls' Trio, Miss Ruth Austin, violin; Miss Catherine Fallon, 'cello; Miss Mildred Harron, piano, and the Boston Masonic Club Trio, Miss Alfreda M. Call, violin; Miss Eunice Condon, 'cello, and Miss Elsie C. Wright, piano. The entertainment will be followed by dancing under the direction of Bro. Roscoe L. Davidson.

POP CONCERTS

This is the thirty-seventh season of the historical institution which is unique to Boston and so very much Boston's own. Night after night the "Pops" are surpassing all records in the popularity of the programmes, quality of performance, and the general atmosphere of a "lively time".

One very potent reason for the eminent popularity of the Pop Concerts lies in the personality, the skill and the irrepressible enthusiasm of Agide Jacchia, the celebrated "Pops" conductor of six seasons. He has to do his bidding a superb orchestra of 75 musicians; in short, a full-sized symphony orchestra which could not be matched in this or any other city in the summer season.

All "Pops" nights are open to the public and of general public interest (excepting Friday, June 16, and Monday, June 19). Thursday, June 15, will bring a programme of dance music, and Monday, June 26, request night.

THREE WEEKS MORE OF THE POPS

Only three more weeks remain of what is now assured to be the largest season the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall have ever had.

For Monday of the coming week (June 19), Boston University has taken over the Pop Concert, but all other nights are open to the public.

The program for Tuesday will include overtures to "Sakuntala" and "Tannhauser," the "Peer Gynt" suite, Rachmaninov's prelude, Volga Bargemen's Song, Strauss's Waltz, "Artists' Life," and the Bacchanale from Saint-Saens' "Samson." For Wednesday may be mentioned the Rakoczy March, "Butterfly" Fantasia, Liszt's First Rhapsody, "1812" Overture; for Thursday the "Blue Danube" Waltz; "Carmen" Fantasia, Second Rhapsody of Liszt, "Eili, Eili," Overture to "Rienzi," and the "Espana" Waltz; for Friday "Pomp and Circumstance," "Finlandia," and the Marche Slave. For Saturday, "Aida" Fantasia, Finale of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, "Reve Angelique," Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris," Jacchia's arrangement of the negro folk songs, and the "Ride of the Valkyries."

THE SAMENESS OF THE POPS

To the Editor of the Transcript:

I was glad to see a note in the Transcript relative to the Pop Concerts. I attended the Pops three nights the first week of the concerts, and heard four repetitions. The second week I attended one concert, when there were five repetitions of pieces played on the other three nights. The third week I went once again. On this occasion I heard no less than seven pieces—nearly half of all the pieces that were played—that I had heard on the previous four nights. Not only so, but several pieces were second or even third repetitions. After this experience, one is about ready to stay at home.

POP CONCERTS IN FIFTH WEEK

This will be the eighth week of the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. Only two more weeks remain of the season which in attendance is now assured to be the largest the Pops have ever had.

Generously responding to popular demand, Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symphony Orchestra add numerous encores every night to programs already abundant, making the musical fare rich indeed. Meanwhile, on warmer nights ice cream and Pop Punch disappear in enormous quantities.

Tomorrow's concert has been requisitioned by Boston University, but all other nights are open to the public, including Notre Dame Night on Friday, June 23.

Pops' Season Most Successful in Its History

By Olin Downes

The most successful season in the history of the Pop concerts comes to an end next Saturday night in Symphony Hall. The popularity these concerts have attained with the public should be hardly less gratifying to the management than the constantly increasing interest in the concerts given by the complete Symphony Orchestra in the winter. In fact, the two circumstances are related. Under Mr. Jacchia, particularly, the programmes of the Pops while keeping the flavor of "popular" music of the day have also included a great deal of the substantial music which finds place on the winter programmes, and this music has proven fully as acceptable to the audience as the waltzes, marches and operetta music of the day.

Patrons of the Pop concerts find to their astonishment that the music they thought interesting chiefly to specialists and students is just as interesting and stimulating to them. As a result they begin, sometimes cautiously by sharing a ticket to the winter subscription series with a friend, then go farther and become regular attenders the season following.

Because of the Pop concerts, the children's concerts given after school hours in the winter, and the rapidly growing love of the great general public of Boston for orchestral music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is becoming more and more a musical institution representative of the tastes of the whole city, and less an artistic organization which ministers to the interests of a chosen few. The Symphony concerts are becoming genuinely democratized, through a wise policy of meeting the public halfway, and gaining its whole-hearted support for an organization which should and probably will last as long as the city which gave it birth.

In the meantime the Pop concerts are crowded to capacity, table space—as well as balconies—and this not only on the "special nights" taken by colleges or other institutions—being often desposed of in advance of the concert. The public now takes the Pops as an accustomed pleasure, and it supports them, in this spirit, often in preference to a comedy or an operetta elsewhere. That is an accomplishment of which Symphony Hall may well be proud.

Closing Week of the "Pops" in Symphony Hall

A series of special programs will be the feature of the closing week of the "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall, thus ending the 37th season, in which Agide Jacchia and his splendid symphony orchestra have had a more pronounced success than ever before.

Tomorrow night the last Russian-Tchaikovsky program of the season will include Rimsky-Korsakov's "Hymn to the Sun," the "1812" overture, numbers of the Tchaikovsky Polonaise, and the finale of the Fifth Symphony.

July 4 the "request" program will be repeated, number for number, as it was performed last week. It includes the "Blue Danube" waltz, "Eili, Eili," finale of "Scheherazade," the "1812" and "Tannhauser" overtures, Liszt's Second Rhapsody, and other of the "Pops" favorites.

Wednesday the "Cavalleria Rusticana" Fantasia will be played, also the "Lohengrin" prelude, "Finlandia" and "Pomp and Circumstance." Thursday will bring an operatic program, including excerpts from "Gioconda," "Cavalleria," "Die Meistersinger," "La Boheme," "Othello," "Mignon" and "Thais."

Friday there will be the "Oberon" overture, Liszt's Second Rhapsody "Love-Death," from "Tristan," and finale of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. Saturday, the closing night will be characterized by another popular program, including "Aida" Fantasia, "March Clave," "Dubinushka," "Tannhauser" overture, "Peer Gynt" suite and "Rakoczy" march.

Pops' Season Most Successful in Its History

By Olin Downes

The most successful season in the history of the Pop concerts comes to an end next Saturday night in Symphony Hall. The popularity these concerts have attained with the public should be hardly less gratifying to the management than the constantly increasing interest in the concerts given by the complete Symphony Orchestra in the winter. In fact, the two circumstances are related. Under Mr. Jacchia, particularly, the programmes of the Pops while keeping the flavor of "popular" music of the day have also included a great deal of the substantial music which finds place on the winter programmes, and this music has proven fully as acceptable to the audience as the waltzes, marches and operetta music of the day.

Patrons of the Pop concerts find to their astonishment that the music they thought interesting chiefly to specialists and students is just as interesting and stimulating to them. As a result they begin, sometimes cautiously by sharing a ticket to the winter subscription series with a friend, then go farther and become regular attenders the season following.

Because of the Pop concerts, the children's concerts given after school hours in the winter, and the rapidly growing love of the great general public of Boston for orchestral music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is becoming more and more a musical institution representative of the tastes of the whole city, and less an artistic organization which ministers to the interests of a chosen few. The Symphony concerts are becoming genuinely democratized, through a wise policy of meeting the public halfway, and gaining its whole-hearted support for an organization which should and probably will last as long as the city which gave it birth.

In the meantime the Pop concerts are crowded to capacity, table space—as well as balconies—and this not only on the "special nights" taken by colleges or other institutions—being often desposed of in advance of the concert. The public now takes the Pops as an accustomed pleasure, and it supports them, in this spirit, often in preference to a comedy or an operetta elsewhere. That is an accomplishment of which Symphony Hall may well be proud.

The Pops

Should be on every teacher's calendar. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was only three years old when the "Pops" began. The year was 1885. The experiment of a post-winter series of concerts in lighter vein to suit the warmer season was modelled on similar concerts in Europe. The formal rows of floor seats were removed, tables installed, popular music was blended with food, drink, and an easy undercurrent of social conversation.

The combination proved ideal — a rare harmony in itself. And since the Pop Concerts also brought summer employment to the musicians of the Orchestra, they had a twofold raison d'etre. They flourished from the start and they still flourish hugely in this, their thirty-seventh season, now drawing to a close.

Other cities have repeatedly tried to emulate the Pops — but, for some reason, vainly. They are as unique to Boston as the Bunker Hill monument — and far more delightful.

A full-sized symphony orchestra of 75 musicians (all drawn from the Boston Symphony Orchestra) play under Agide Jacchia, the most popular conductor the Pops have ever had. They give superfine performances of a quality not to be matched elsewhere at this time of the year. No species of music is strange to the programmes, which range from waltzes, entre actes, and marches to the thunders of Wagner, Verdi, and Tschaikowsky. The music becomes the more pleasing in that you may converse with your friends, and consume refreshments at the tables or at the "Pops Bar" in the balcony.

The Pops are held in Symphony Hall, which was built for the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1900, and is in itself worth visiting as the most beautiful concert hall in America. Every night of the week (Sunday excepted) is a Pops night. Table seats at the Pops $1, $.75, Balcony Seats $1, $.75, $.50, $.25 (no tax). On sale at the Pops Booth at Convention Headquarters.

MUSIC NOTES AFIELD.

Philip Hale, noting the end of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's forty-first year, finds that, after all, the chief feature of the season was the re-engagement of Mr. Monteux. The superb qualities of the orchestra are due to him. There must be a master mind, controlling, but sympathetic; intelligent, but not pedantic; broad-minded, but not tolerant of pretentious, empty of flashy compositions; regardful of the audience, but not courting its applause by sensational appeals and prima donna airs.

Looking over the programs one is struck by the catholic taste of Mr. Monteux, by his wish that all schools should be represented as far as possible; that works of contemporaneous and radical composers should not be ignored; that the old masters should be heard, but not to the slighting of the younger.

Wagner led with six performances. Then come Bach and Rimsky-Korsakov with five each; Beethoven, Brahms and Liszt with four each; Franck, Handel, Liadov, Loeffler, Mozart, with three each; Berlioz, Casella, Debussy, Haydn, d'Indy, Pierre, Rachmaninov, Ravel, Saminsky, Schoenberg, Schreker, Schubert, Schumann, Sibelius, Strauss, Tchaikovsky, Weber, with two.

Composers represented by a single work were Alvarez, Bruch, Chabrier, Chadwick, Cherubini, Converse, De Falla, Eichheim, Gilbert, Goldmark, Gretry, Hill, Hue, Humperdinck, Lalande, Liapounov, Massenet, Mendelssohn, Moussorgsky, Prokofiev, Rabaud, Rossini, Saint-Saëns, Smetana, Smith, Szymanovski, T. Ysaye. Was there ever in the history of the orchestra so catholic and so interesting a selection? Fifty-five composers were represented in all. Counting Austrian composers and Liszt with German, we find 18 represented. French, Cherubini included, 14; Russian, 9; American, 8; Spanish, 2; Italian, 2; Finn, 1; Belgian, 1, and Handel, surely English by adoption, 1.

The American composers were Chadwick, Converse, Eichheim, Gilbert, Goodrich, Hill, Loeffler, Smith.

Mr. Monteux's new productions, the critic adds, were: Converse—Symphony, E major; Eichheim—Oriental Impressions; Franck-Goodrich—Organ Chorale No. 2, B minor, arranged for orchestra and organ. Hill—Waltzes for orchestra. Loeffler—Three Irish fantasies for voice and orchestra (John McCormack), and Smith—A Poem of Youth. There was also performed, for the first time in Boston, the "impressive suite" written by Henry F. Gilbert for the Pilgrim Tercentenary.

BOSTON "POPS" SEASON CLOSES BRILLIANTLY

Capacity Audiences Have Been the Rule, This Season Being Claimed as the Best of All—Conductor Jacchia's Popularity Increases—Miquelles Score in Providence—Summer Session at the New England Conservatory—Alice Armstrong Pleases

Boston, July 9, 1922.—Last Saturday, July 8, the thirty-seventh season of the "Pop" Concerts in Symphony Hall came to a crowded close. This season has outdistanced any previous one in the box office and likewise in the general popularity of Agide Jacchia's programs and performances. Mr. Jacchia has led the "Pops" Symphony Orchestra for six seasons, and, although his predecessors were likewise distinguished, this celebrity is pretty generally conceded to be the best director the "Pops" have ever had.

No music is more popular at the "Pops" than Mr. Jacchia's own numbers, such as his "Tarantelle," and his arrangements for full orchestra of "Elli, Elli," the Russian folk songs of the Volga bargemen and "Dubinushka." To these he has lately added a suite of Afro-American folk songs, including "You May Bury Me in de Eas'," "Musieu Bainjo," and "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen."

The special nights of the season just past have included a Russian and two Russian-Tschaikowsky programs, two operatic programs, an Italian-Verdi, Wagner, and dance program. The request program, the most popular of them all, was made, not by the conductor, but by the "Pops" fans themselves, in that the numbers played were determined entirely from the ballots of the "Pops" public, dropped nightly in a ballot box in the corridor.

No soloists were called in from the outside, for the "Pops" do not need such additions, nor does the "Pops" public ask for them. Many organizations have celebrated at the "Pops," including the following colleges: Harvard, Technology, Amherst, Northeastern University, Boston University, Radcliffe, Wellesley, Simmons, Smith; likewise various conventions, schools, fraternities, clubs, and staffs of employees. These almost nightly additions to the numbers of regular "Pop"-goers have made "capacity" a very familiar word at the "Pops."

A UNIQUE INSTITUTION

In the "Pop" Concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston, which have just drawn to the close of their thirty-seventh season, the Hub City can claim—probably unchallenged—an institution unique and peculiarly its own. In Europe there are similar concerts, and indeed the Boston "Pops," when started in 1884, were modelled on the Bilse Concerts at Berlin. But the summer concerts as given there now are out-of-doors, while Sir Henry Wood's popular Sunday concerts in London offer neither tables nor refreshments, although smoking is permitted at Queen's Hall. "Pop" Concerts have been attempted now and again in other cities, but without permanent success. The splendid Stadium concerts in New York are quite different in character. The Boston "Pops," with a more limited public, are likewise less serious, avoiding programs too symphonic and relegating such things as entire symphonies to the winter season.

The secret—perhaps the prime secret—of their success has been the exact blend of music, conversation and refreshment. This blend has been proportioned to a hair's breadth, so that these three elements of a good time may go blithely hand in hand, while none steps upon the toes of another. Things progress swiftly at the "Pops"; variety and gaiety abound.

On the tables, which cover the floor of Symphony Hall, are menus, with the sub-titles "To Eat," "To Drink," "To Nibble," "To Smoke." One may do all of these things, and likewise make remarks, in an undertone, without incurring disfavor from one's neighbor. For those in the balconies refreshments come with the intermissions, when they repair to the cafe or a bar-room provided for the purpose.

The highest end of the "Pops" repertory includes a movement from "Scheherazade" before a symphony of Tschaikowsky, such rhapsodies as "Espana," "Finlandia," Enesco's familiar one, Casella's "Italia," and such worthier overtures as those of Wagner, Weber or Mozart. The lower end of the repertory reveals the waltzes of Strauss or Waldteufel, a march now and then, an entr'acte or similar confection, even an operetta selection of the day.

Agide Jacchia, the "Pops" conductor of six seasons past, while making no revolution in the programs, has gradually wooed his public (which, it must not be forgotten, is a musically untutored public) towards the higher end of the repertory. It is surely to his credit that the public is with him to the echo and applauds the worthier music far more than the sugary kind.

Of course, the "Pops" exist primarily as a substantial boon in the general prosperity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They extend the contracts of the musicians ten weeks; they bring income to the budget of the orchestra, and they initiate a by no means reluctant public into the delights of symphonic music, thus opening the way to the winter concerts.

When prohibition came, many exclaimed that "Pops" without beer were inconceivable. On the contrary, the "Pops" have grown yearly in attendance and in the amount of refreshments consumed, the season just past breaking all records in these respects. So long as there is music in Boston—and Boston is more eager for music than ever—winter symphony concerts will resolve annually into summer "Pops."

The Pops

Should be on every teacher's calendar. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was only three years old when the "Pops" began. The year was 1885. The experiment of a post-winter series of concerts in lighter vein to suit the warmer season was modelled on similar concerts in Europe. The formal rows of floor seats were removed, tables installed, popular music was blended with food, drink, and an easy undercurrent of social conversation.

The combination proved ideal — a rare harmony in itself. And since the Pop Concerts also brought summer employment to the musicians of the Orchestra, they had a twofold raison d'etre. They flourished from the start and they still flourish hugely in this, their thirty-seventh season, now drawing to a close.

Other cities have repeatedly tried to emulate the Pops — but, for some reason, vainly. They are as unique to Boston as the Bunker Hill monument — and far more delightful.

A full-sized symphony orchestra of 75 musicians (all drawn from the Boston Symphony Orchestra) play under Agide Jacchia, the most popular conductor the Pops have ever had. They give superfine performances of a quality not to be matched elsewhere at this time of the year. No species of music is strange to the programmes, which range from waltzes, entre actes, and marches to the thunders of Wagner, Verdi, and Tschaikowsky. The music becomes the more pleasing in that you may converse with your friends, and consume refreshments at the tables or at the "Pops Bar" in the balcony.

The Pops are held in Symphony Hall, which was built for the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1900, and is in itself worth visiting as the most beautiful concert hall in America. Every night of the week (Sunday excepted) is a Pops night. Table seats at the Pops $1, $.75, Balcony Seats $1, $.75, $.50, $.25 (no tax). On sale at the Pops Booth at Convention Headquarters.

MUSIC NOTES AFIELD.

Philip Hale, noting the end of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's forty-first year, finds that, after all, the chief feature of the season was the re-engagement of Mr. Monteux. The superb qualities of the orchestra are due to him. There must be a master mind, controlling, but sympathetic; intelligent, but not pedantic; broad-minded, but not tolerant of pretentious, empty of flashy compositions; regardful of the audience, but not courting its applause by sensational appeals and prima donna airs.

Looking over the programs one is struck by the catholic taste of Mr. Monteux, by his wish that all schools should be represented as far as possible; that works of contemporaneous and radical composers should not be ignored; that the old masters should be heard, but not to the slighting of the younger.

Wagner led with six performances. Then come Bach and Rimsky-Korsakov with five each; Beethoven, Brahms and Liszt with four each; Franck, Handel, Liadov, Loeffler, Mozart, with three each; Berlioz, Casella, Debussy, Haydn, d'Indy, Pierre, Rachmaninov, Ravel, Saminsky, Schoenberg, Schreker, Schubert, Schumann, Sibelius, Strauss, Tchaikovsky, Weber, with two.

Composers represented by a single work were Alvarez, Bruch, Chabrier, Chadwick, Cherubini, Converse, De Falla, Eichheim, Gilbert, Goldmark, Gretry, Hill, Hue, Humperdinck, Lalande, Liapounov, Massenet, Mendelssohn, Moussorgsky, Prokofiev, Rabaud, Rossini, Saint-Saëns, Smetana, Smith, Szymanovski, T. Ysaye. Was there ever in the history of the orchestra so catholic and so interesting a selection? Fifty-five composers were represented in all. Counting Austrian composers and Liszt with German, we find 18 represented. French, Cherubini included, 14; Russian, 9; American, 8; Spanish, 2; Italian, 2; Finn, 1; Belgian, 1, and Handel, surely English by adoption, 1.

The American composers were Chadwick, Converse, Eichheim, Gilbert, Goodrich, Hill, Loeffler, Smith.

Mr. Monteux's new productions, the critic adds, were: Converse—Symphony, E major; Eichheim—Oriental Impressions; Franck-Goodrich—Organ Chorale No. 2, B minor, arranged for orchestra and organ. Hill—Waltzes for orchestra. Loeffler—Three Irish fantasies for voice and orchestra (John McCormack), and Smith—A Poem of Youth. There was also performed, for the first time in Boston, the "impressive suite" written by Henry F. Gilbert for the Pilgrim Tercentenary.

BOSTON "POPS" SEASON CLOSES BRILLIANTLY

Capacity Audiences Have Been the Rule, This Season Being Claimed as the Best of All—Conductor Jacchia's Popularity Increases—Miquelles Score in Providence—Summer Session at the New England Conservatory—Alice Armstrong Pleases

Boston, July 9, 1922.—Last Saturday, July 8, the thirty-seventh season of the "Pop" Concerts in Symphony Hall came to a crowded close. This season has outdistanced any previous one in the box office and likewise in the general popularity of Agide Jacchia's programs and performances. Mr. Jacchia has led the "Pops" Symphony Orchestra for six seasons, and, although his predecessors were likewise distinguished, this celebrity is pretty generally conceded to be the best director the "Pops" have ever had.

No music is more popular at the "Pops" than Mr. Jacchia's own numbers, such as his "Tarantelle," and his arrangements for full orchestra of "Elli, Elli," the Russian folk songs of the Volga bargemen and "Dubinushka." To these he has lately added a suite of Afro-American folk songs, including "You May Bury Me in de Eas'," "Musieu Bainjo," and "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen."

The special nights of the season just past have included a Russian and two Russian-Tschaikowsky programs, two operatic programs, an Italian-Verdi, Wagner, and dance program. The request program, the most popular of them all, was made, not by the conductor, but by the "Pops" fans themselves, in that the numbers played were determined entirely from the ballots of the "Pops" public, dropped nightly in a ballot box in the corridor.

No soloists were called in from the outside, for the "Pops" do not need such additions, nor does the "Pops" public ask for them. Many organizations have celebrated at the "Pops," including the following colleges: Harvard, Technology, Amherst, Northeastern University, Boston University, Radcliffe, Wellesley, Simmons, Smith; likewise various conventions, schools, fraternities, clubs, and staffs of employees. These almost nightly additions to the numbers of regular "Pop"-goers have made "capacity" a very familiar word at the "Pops."

A UNIQUE INSTITUTION

In the "Pop" Concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston, which have just drawn to the close of their thirty-seventh season, the Hub City can claim—probably unchallenged—an institution unique and peculiarly its own. In Europe there are similar concerts, and indeed the Boston "Pops," when started in 1884, were modelled on the Bilse Concerts at Berlin. But the summer concerts as given there now are out-of-doors, while Sir Henry Wood's popular Sunday concerts in London offer neither tables nor refreshments, although smoking is permitted at Queen's Hall. "Pop" Concerts have been attempted now and again in other cities, but without permanent success. The splendid Stadium concerts in New York are quite different in character. The Boston "Pops," with a more limited public, are likewise less serious, avoiding programs too symphonic and relegating such things as entire symphonies to the winter season.

The secret—perhaps the prime secret—of their success has been the exact blend of music, conversation and refreshment. This blend has been proportioned to a hair's breadth, so that these three elements of a good time may go blithely hand in hand, while none steps upon the toes of another. Things progress swiftly at the "Pops"; variety and gaiety abound.

On the tables, which cover the floor of Symphony Hall, are menus, with the sub-titles "To Eat," "To Drink," "To Nibble," "To Smoke." One may do all of these things, and likewise make remarks, in an undertone, without incurring disfavor from one's neighbor. For those in the balconies refreshments come with the intermissions, when they repair to the cafe or a bar-room provided for the purpose.

The highest end of the "Pops" repertory includes a movement from "Scheherazade" before a symphony of Tschaikowsky, such rhapsodies as "Espana," "Finlandia," Enesco's familiar one, Casella's "Italia," and such worthier overtures as those of Wagner, Weber or Mozart. The lower end of the repertory reveals the waltzes of Strauss or Waldteufel, a march now and then, an entr'acte or similar confection, even an operetta selection of the day.

Agide Jacchia, the "Pops" conductor of six seasons past, while making no revolution in the programs, has gradually wooed his public (which, it must not be forgotten, is a musically untutored public) towards the higher end of the repertory. It is surely to his credit that the public is with him to the echo and applauds the worthier music far more than the sugary kind.

Of course, the "Pops" exist primarily as a substantial boon in the general prosperity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They extend the contracts of the musicians ten weeks; they bring income to the budget of the orchestra, and they initiate a by no means reluctant public into the delights of symphonic music, thus opening the way to the winter concerts.

When prohibition came, many exclaimed that "Pops" without beer were inconceivable. On the contrary, the "Pops" have grown yearly in attendance and in the amount of refreshments consumed, the season just past breaking all records in these respects. So long as there is music in Boston—and Boston is more eager for music than ever—winter symphony concerts will resolve annually into summer "Pops."

Politics Resumed.

Premier Takahashi and all of the members of his Cabinet, which is the old Hara Cabient, are to remain in office for a time longer as a result of the compromise reached between the Premier and his Ministers, but in being forced into the compromise Mr. Takahashi has lost ground appreciably. The whole nation, but what is more important, the politicians of the nation, credit him with a defeat in so doing.

That Mr. Takahashi is not a thoroughly acceptable Premier even to his backers seems apparent; that the Seiyukai is in a dilemma to find a better and a stronger man to take his place is also evident. When the Premier read the Imperial Rescript adjourning the forty-fifth session of the Diet he read his own political death warrant, not because of what he had done himself but merely because the close of the Diet session marked the center of the political calm which had borne him into office. Mr. Takahashi has never been more than a stop-gap Premier. The tragic death of Premier Hara at the critical moment of the convening of the Washington conference made it necessary that some man step into his place who would and could carry on with as little change of policy as possible. Although Mr. Takahashi was severely criticized on several counts from the floor of the Diet, as was to be expected, it was when he attempted to branch off from Mr. Hara's precedents and take an independent and new line of policy that the storm became so great he was forced to bow to it and retrace his steps, following in the shadow of the late Commoner-Premier.

Mr. Hara, alive, was able to whip the Diet and the majority party into line. Mr. Hara, dead, has been the dominating influence of Japanese politics since November 4.

The Washington conference has ended; the forty-fifth session of the Diet has closed; the political forces are ready to call off their unofficial truce.

In the new political situation perhaps the most important element is death. Not only is Mr. Hara gone, but the man who has been able to make and unmake Cabinets and Premiers in the past, Prince Yamagata, has joined the ranks of most of those with whom he had worked Marquis Okuma, who never failed to loom as a possible candidate for Premier in a crisis, is also gone. Definite, well-established lines along which politics moved have been erased, leaving the sea somewhat uncharted. The Seiyukai is without a strong leader and so is the powerful group of bureaucrats. It is likely that some one man will dominate the bureaucrats, since that is the way bureaucracy is apt to work out. He will come from within their present ranks, but, while he may dominate the group, it is by no means certain that he will be able through this group to control national life as did Prince Yamagata. Because of the peculiar constitution of political parties and political thinking in Japan it is necessary that some one man dominate the Seiyukai if that party is to retain power. Apparently there is not one out-and-out Seiyukai man of sufficient ability to do this, nor does the party possess a partisan of Prime Ministerial calibre. Realizing this, the one course open to the Seiyukai is to adopt into its fold some strong man. Probably less than a half dozen men in Japan would object to such an adoption. The man who rises to the leadership of the bureaucracy would, most certainly. The men who hope to reach that position and fail, of which there will be at least four or five, will eagerly grasp the chance offered by an alliance with the majority party. A half dozen names readily come to mind when such a step is considered, but to narrow down to one is not possible until the Seiyukai has worked out in greater detail the specific needs of its future leader and the qualification which each of the candidates has to offer.

The Royal Visit Ends.

Tonight, at 6 o'clock, the Royal Salute will be fired at Kagoshima as the Prince of Wales leaves Japan after having been here since the morning of April 12.

That his visit to this country has been eminently worth while is without question. The results of the visit, especially the extent of the results, can not be accurately forecast. The visit must have influenced the thought of His Royal Highness to some extent, enlarging and clarifying his views of Japan. In turn, it must be productive of great effect on the thought of the members of the Imperial Family here, perhaps less on the Prince Regent than on the others, since His Imperial Highness had the advantage of a visit to England himself last year. Even more important is the effect it has had and will increasingly continue to have on the subjects of His Imperial Majesty. They saw the Heir to the throne of one of the world's greatest nations at first hand and they saw him as a human being. Not for a second forgetting that he was a Prince, did he fail to be human. No mystery enshrouded him. Instead, Japan must have perceived the genuine respect and love which the British residents here as well as in all parts of the world bear their reigning family. To most it was something of a revelation.

Having seen and believed, it is to be expected that practice will follow. It is likely that the Prince Regent is closer to the hearts, the human hearts, of his future subjects today than he has ever been. It is certain that he is more "accessible," for his playing on the hotel golf links at Miyanoshita, his posing for a press photographer and his attendance at the Imperial Theater are precedents which have brought him closer to the everyday life of the nation.

The visit has undoubtedly done much to draw the peoples of the two Empires nearer to each other, to introduce them. There is scarcely a school boy or girl in Tokyo and in other cities of Japan today who does not know the tune and the words, though somewhat garbled, of "God Save the King." To each Japanese who saw His Royal Highness, who learned this hymn or whose life in any way touched that of the visitor, England is a bit more real and more of a friend than she would have been otherwise.

"AN ADMIRAL'S YARNS"

Sir Charles Dundas Recalls Incidents in Tokyo.

Japan comes in for a goodly share of the anecdotes told by Admiral Sir Charles Dundas of Dundas in his memories of half a century, which he has called "An Admiral's Yarns." The Channel Fleet controversy between the then Lord Charles Beresford and Sir Percy Scott was so distasteful to Sir Charles Dundas that, hearing a captain was wanted to go out to Tokyo as Naval Attache, he volunteered and was appointed.

One of the anecdotes in the book relates to Sir Claud MacDonald, British Ambassador at the time, who was invited to a banquet in Tokyo, the dress being evening clothes and not uniform:

"He was not certain whether he ought to wear his orders or not. Knowing how particular the Japanese were about these matters, he decided to wear them. Arriving a few minutes late, he found the room full of Japanese officials, but none of them wore any decorations.

"Taking advantage of the first opportunity, he slipped out of the room and, quickly taking off his stars, dropped them into the pocket of his overcoat in the cloak-room. On his return to the reception hall he found that during his absence from the room every one of the Japanese officials had put on his stars and medals. There was a momentary silence of astonishment on all sides, when the humor of the situation appealed to everyone, and there was a good, hearty laugh over the incident."

Punctilious themselves, the Japanese are often puzzled over the aggressiveness of the West. On one occasion the wife of the British Ambassador was making her presentations to the Empress in the Imperial tent, when she was abruptly accosted by a lady from Chicago who had literally pushed her way into the Imperial circle with the words: "Say, here—present me to the Empress." The presentation was made, so to speak, at the point of the bayonet, after which the wife of the Ambassador attempted to take the intruder to task by asking her why she had forced herself into the Imperial presence without going through the usual red tape of official channels:

"'Wal, Wal, I don't see what's wrong, anyway,' was the reply; 'if I want to be introduced to the Empress, why should't I be?'

"Seeing the hopelessness of prolonging the discussion, the Ambassador's wife withdrew.

"Then one of the Embassy staff, rather a wag, appʻoched the offender, and said: 'You are a very bad woman to behave like that.'

"The reply was sardonic.

"'Say, here, who was that angry old woman who spoke to me just now?'

"'That was the wife of the British Ambassador,' replied the attache.

"'Gee whizz! You don't say,' was all the American could answer as she buried herself in her mayonnaise."

Of Admiral Togo the author observes that he was perhaps the most modest and unassuming hero that he had ever met. Once when the Admiral was dining with him in Tokyo, Sir Charles asked him to write a few words in Japanese so that he could have them framed and hung up as a guide for his sons through life. The words he wrote were: "The utmost truth." That, concludes the author, described the great Japanese better than any eulogy.

FAR EASTERN MUSIC IN THE WEST

American Composer's Oriental Themes Heard at Boston Concert.

Mr. Henry Eichheim, who visited Japan in 1915 and who spent practically all of 1919 in the Far East, gave to the audience at the nineteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season a touch of the Far East in music, for he conducted the orchestration of "Oriental Impressions for Orchestra," which he had composed himself. The Impressions consist of four sketches, Korean, Siamese, Japanese and Chinese.

Teh "Korean Sketch" is based on themes heard and noted by Mr. Eichheim at Seoul. At first there is the street laborer's song, sung during working hours. There are usually five men. One, the leader, sings a refrain, to which the others answer. They work when it occurs to them to do so. The song, as a rule, is of a humorous nature. In Mr. Eichheim's sketch this song is given to the English horn. There is a contrasting motive played by a street musician (flute). Other motives are from the theater. The closing theme is the love song (oboe) of a geisha, sung to Mr. Eichheim in Seoul. His photograph of her was published in the February issue of Asia. The "Korean Sketch" is orchestrated for two flutes, two bassoons, four horns, a Chinese drum, antique cymbals, a large tam-tam, two harps, pianoforte, 20 violins, eight violas, eight violincellos and eight double-basses.

The "Siamese Sketch" begins with the irregular sounding of the four bells that, waved by the wind, hang on the Emerald Temple in Bangkok, where the King of Siam worships. The next motive is a chant of a Buddhist priest (English horn). The racket in a theater follows. Then a street musician plays on the ekeh, a Siamese reed instrument of bamboo. The cry of a woman pedlar is for the viola and English horn, while the four temple bells bring the close of the sketch. The score calls for flute, oboe, English horn, harp, pianoforte, marimba, xylophone, a symbal struck with a sharp metal disk, antique symbals, a large brass bell, four bells, a large tam-tam, 20 violins and eight violas.

Night Sounds of Tokyo.

The "Japanese Nocturne" is based on motives heard at night in Ikao, Matsushima, Yokohama and Tokyo played by blind masseurs with the shrill piping of the hot noodle man and other venders of food, the playing of a koto and the chanting of a prayer by an old man beating a small wooden bell. The piccolo, two oboes, English horn, bass clarinet, four horns, two harps, ancient cymbals, a Japanese fish-head, 20 violins, six violas, six violincellos and six double-basses are used.

The "Chinese Sketch" contains music heard in Buddhist temples, in theaters and tea houses, at wedding and funeral processions and the street cries and other sounds of city and country life heard in Peking, Hangchow, the Buddhist temples in the Western Hills near Peking, Shanghai, Hongkong, Canton and a number of villages. The piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, English horn, two bassoons, four horns, two harps, pianoforte, fluctuating tam-tam, large tam-tam, a Chinese wooden block, xylophone, two small temple bells, small cymbals, antique cymbals, 20 violins, eight violas, eight violincellos and eight double-basses are used. This sketch was written in Peking for the piano and was played by Mrs. Eichheim at a concert in the Grand Hotel des Wagons-Lits on October 21, 1919.

Mr. Eichheim, whose father was a violincellist of reputation and was a members of Theodore Thomas' orchestra for many years, studied under some of the best of present-day masters. He was a member of Theodore Thomas' orchestra in New York for a year, but in 1890 joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, leaving it in 1912 to devote himself to composition, concert work, teaching and photography. In 1915 he visited Japan, returning in 1919 and remaining nearly a year except for excursions into other Far Eastern countries. In addition to the four sketches, he has composed other orchestral pieces with Oriental motives, one of them being "The Story of the Bell," which was suggested by a Lafacdio Hearns story.

Praised by Critics.

At the concert in Boston, D'Indy's "Wallestein" Trilogy was played, and Emilio de Gorgoza was the soloist. Boston critics, in reviewing the concert, praised Mr. Eichheim's work highly. The critics of the Boston Transcript pointed out that the compositions were, first, a satisfaction to curiosity, and opened new fields to the Western composer.

"Second satisfaction," adds the critics was the discovery of a new, strange, penetrating, possessing beauty in some of these Oriental sounds. The sheer loveliness of the temple bells at the beginning and the end of the 'Siamese sketch' transported the ear, turned the heart to water. Once and again such rare and sudden beauty exhaled from the Japanese Nocturne,' tingled through the love-song of the geisha of Seoul. These occasional measures, these flitting timbres illuded and intoxicated not merely because they were strange and exotic, but because in them dwelt a magic not yet conjured into the music of the West. Akin was the needle-like intensity of some of this Oriental music, not as a shrillness to pierce the ear, but as a voice to cut sharp and deep into the imagination in expression of rarefied, concentrated moods. Of such was the geisha's wistful tune, the street musician's notes in Bangkok, one or another murmur of the sound-laden Japanese night."

THE CABINET CRISIS

The Situation in Japanese Politics Today.

By an Observer.

For several weeks, brisk and disturbing winds have been blowing across the political waters. There was calm during the visit of the Prince of Wales to the Capital, presumably in deference to the sentiment that only ill-mannered folks bring forth their skeletons when honored guests are present. A second lull has fallen upon the scene by the announcement that the Premier, Viscount Takahashi, has abandoned his determination to reconstruct the present Cabinet by the elimination of two or three undesirable members. That this second lull will be brief is a pretty safe guess.

Although the vernacular press is almost unanimous in its heated denunciation of the present Government, it is impossible to view the position of the Premier without abundant sympathy. The fact is that he began his difficult task under almost fatal handicaps. Viscount Takahashi fell heir to his leadership under circumstances that made it virtually necessary for him to accept the program and working arrangements of his predecessor. The Cabinet as constituted was another man's team, and while the late Mr. Hara managed the combination with reasonable success, it is no secret that in achieving this result, his capacities were frequently taxed to the utmost. Mr. Hara was a statesman cf remarkable sagacity. In addition he was an incomparable politician. His outstanding talents found their consummation in the delicate task of reconciling the discordant elements in the dominant political party of which he was the head. The conditions which prevailed at the time of his death made it exceedingly wise to continue the Government's program with the least possible break. The impending Washington conference was by no means the least of these conditions. Granting this, it is difficult to see how any course other than the one actually taken could have been pursued with very much greater success. Nevertheless, the present crisis was inevitable for the simple reason that no statesman could succeed to the kind of leadership exerted so effectively by Mr. Hara. That leadership was personal, and when a statesman's political pre-eminence rests upon a basis of that kind his shoes can not be filled by another.

Alternatives Offered.

What has actually transpired is, therefore, what was anticipated by many at the time. The Takahashi Ministry is a house divided against itself. Guesses differ as to just how long it will stand, but all are agreed that its duration will probably be brief. Interpreting the rising tide of opposition as fatal to his Ministry in its present form, the Prime Minister recently suggested some renovation, that is, the removal of several Ministers whose records have been most vulnerable to attack. This suggestion was created by what was nothing short of a national outburst, the exact meaning of which it is rather difficult to make out. In general, it may be concluded that everybody wants a complete change. It may be said, of course, that differences within the Cabinet as well as those within the majority party, the Seiyukai, are only contributory to the impending crisis, and that underneath these are issues of national importance upon which the present Government has failed to act in accordance with the popular will. Looking at things from the point of view of maintaining responsible government, this criticism fails to take account of the fact that the Takahashi Ministry still has a majority in the Lower House. It is unquestionably true that the Seiyukai has lost ground in the popular estimation through its connection with the recent South Manchurian scandal, its opposition to the universal male suffrage bill, and, most important of all, through its failure to tackle constructively the complex of financial problems which in the popular estimation is responsible for the continuance of war time living conditions.

It is not unlikely the Premier will renew his suggestion for a reconstructed Seiyukai Ministry. Failing this, a Government by the opposition is at least one, though by no means the only, alternative. Under present conditions, such a step would virtually mean placing responsibility for governing in the hands of the minority. The anomalous character of this procedure is obvious, and yet it is by no means inconceivable that the wheels of fortune may grind out such a result. Considering the personal nature of political allegiance at the present time, together with the marked popular opposition to the Seiyukai, it is not unlikely that a change in the Government may bring in its train considerable shifting in the party allegiance of members of the Diet. On the basis of past experience it is no injustice to say that there is a probably a respectable number of members of the present Parliament who would think it convenient to abandon their loyalty to a party which for indefinite reasons finds itself no longer in power. A further alternative at this juncture is a bureaucratic Government finding its support mainly in the somewhat aggressive political group in the House of Peers known as the Kenkyukai. A glance at the names most frequently mentioned in the Press as possible successors to Premier Viscount Takahashi in the event of his resignation certainly indicates that this latter alternative is the one most likely to materialize.

The present political crisis throws a rather blurred light on the whole question of how much progress Japan has made in the development of responsible government. By all the standards of Western practice, the present Ministry, having a majority in the Lower House should remain in power. For many and complex reasons those standards are not operative in Japan. The leading issues of national policy are not yet drawn with sufficient clarity to divide the electors into clearly defined groups. The idea of loyalty to certain principles of national economy rather than to persons has not yet dominated the political practice of this country. To say that it ought, would be presumptuous. To say that it may, is certainly as safe a prophecy as any. However majorities may stand in Parliament, it is unquestionably true that the present crisis comes in response to the pressure of public opinion. We say this on the assumption that the daily press offers at least some intimation of what the people are think-

JAPAN IN KOREA—IV

The Methods of the Police and the Attitude of the Koreans.

We come next to the matter of political tension, the lessening of which is perhaps the most difficult task of all. Baron Saito has, however, taken hold of it in a most statesmanlike manner.

In the first place, the beginnings of self-government are being made. Advisory councils, largely elective, chosen by persons holding a franchise that is limited by a property qualification, have been established in all the cities and in some villages, as well as in all the provinces. This is perhaps not a very long step, but when we remember that Korean ideas of administration before the annexation were largely of the kind that is ruining China today, we realize that things must move slowly. Moreover, qualified Koreans are now eligible to almost any office in the Government, and such men are accorded the same treatment as their Japanese colleagues. No doubt some of them are inclined to magnify their office, and sometimes the Government has not been wise in its choice of men and some have been taken who were considered by their fellow-countrymen to be too pro-Japanese and the effect has been rather the opposite of what was desired, in these cases. But we must remember that many Koreans who might make capable and efficient men in office refuse to have anything to do with the Japanese administration, and hence the Government is driven to take second choice. No doubt improvement could be made if a greater effort were put forth and all the facts were clearly known to the men who make the appointments.

And it would certainly help matters very materially if more men of talent and ability among the Koreans would give themselves heartily to the work of helping the Administration carry on its various acitivities. This would be a very difficult task, for it would seem to many like a betrayal of their country, though in reality it would be one of the best ways of serving it.

Another move on the part of the Government looking to a better understanding between the two peoples is the giving of a substantial bonus to all Japanese officials who learn the Korean language. This may seem a small thing, but it will have a very far reaching effect, though perhaps not a spectacular one.

The Meddlesome Police.

Probably, as has been said, the branch of the work that comes in for the largest share of criticism is the police. But this is the part of the Administration that comes into most direct contact with the people and which has the most difficult task of all as well. And there is no part of the governmental machinery that is, perhaps, so poorly adapted for its work, in some ways though it may be very efficient in others. We mean by this that the police system of Japan proper, upon which the Korean system has been modelled both in form and spirit, is one of the most efficient in the world in its ability to seek out criminals and to carry out various sanitary and other measures, but it is also noted for its tendency to meddle with all sorts of minor affairs in the life of the people.

The joy with which the so-called "socialiation" of the police in Japan proper was hailed in the spring of 1921 is a modification of how the ordinary policeman's attentions are regarded there. Now transfer such a system of efficiency and, if one may be allowed to use the term, meddlesomeness, from the native land of the policeman to a land where this same man is responsible for the maintenance of order among a people who are more or less hostile to him, whom he regards as his inferiors and whose language he but imperfectly understands, a people who in the words of a veteran missionary, are "past masters in the art of conspiracy," and last of all, give the policeman power to arrest on suspicion, and we have a situation fraught with tremendous difficulties. Add to this the fact that it is hard to get good men in sufficient numbers, and we can get some idea of the problem facing the heads of this department.

That the higher officials are trying to make the system go as smoothly as possible is evidenced by the fact that, over and over, when a man has exceeded his authority, or has acted in an arbitrary manner or has oppressed someone, an appeal to his superiors has brought punishment upon the offender. The provincial authorities and those of the Government-General are ready at any time to probe charges brought against any policeman when made with evidence enough to warrant an investigation. Of course, not every case thus investigated can be proved satisfactorily enough to justify severe punishment, for such probing is by no means easy, but the fact that one provincial chief of police discharged 200 out of his entire force of 1,200 policemen in the course of one year indicates that pretty radical measures are taken when necessary.

The Governor General has promulgated a policy of justice and humanity, and he sincerely intends to carry it out, and the problem now is simply a matter of geting his ideas firmly implanted in the minds of local officials and policemen. That this can ever be done to a thoroughly satisfactory extent may be open to question, for few chiefs of any kind are able to do that, but certainly there will be great improvement as time goes on. In fact there are evidences on every hand that improvement is taking place, for almost every missionary in Korea admits that things are growing better right along. Along the Yalu border the people are now more and more inclined to report marauding bands of their countrymen to the police, whereas formerly they were afraid to do so lest these "patriots" turn on them and the police fail to give them adequate protection.

Torture Still Practised.

When we come to the matter of persons arrested and the treatment they receive, we are on more troublesome ground. Flogging, as a punishment, has been abolished, but torture, usually the pouring of water into the nostrils, is still often used in examining arrested persons. With no desire to apologize for such a procedure, one may be perhaps permitted to say that such proceedings are not unknown in other places than Korea. The matter of torture in examining suspected persons has been the subject of investigation by the Tokyo Bar Association within the last year, and the "third degree" as applied in American prisons is no light matter, nor is it entirely a thing of the past, either. Besides this, the prisoner is of a race trained in the art of deceiving the police, and, being of a different race it is difficult for the official to know what to believe and what not to believe. However, the police all know that things treasonable to the Government are going on all the time.

They know that funds are being collected for the Shanghai Provisional Government and that communication is being carried on with this body right along. What else there may be they can only guess. So when they see anything that seems to them suspicious it raises the hope that they have found a clue that may lead somewhere. And when the prisoner refuses to speak, they do their best to make him do so. The method used is often damnable and, so far as getting at the truth of matters is concerned, absolutely futile, but we may understand the motives of such action better if we consider the circumstances in which the officers find themselves, even though we may hope that they will speedily be reformed or reproved.

So far we have spoken only of the Japanese policeman and have said nothing of his Korean fellow. But about all that need be said of him is that he is usually fully as harsh as the other man in his methods and is certainly more cordially hated by his fellow countrymen. He will doubtless develop better qualities as his education advances and he gets a better comprehension of the policy of the present Governor General as contrasted with either the ancient regime of the Yi Dynasty or the earlier military rule of the Japanese. In fact, the Administration is making a strong effort to augment and to improve this part of the force and is already meeting with a considerable measure of success. This will be increasingly so as more Koreans of the better class realize that they must work out their destiny under Japanese guidance, and that it is for the good of Korea to do so, and also that they must help in this more and more.

A Modern "Pooh Bah."

A Sydney merchant sold a quantity of piece goods to a storekeeper in a small town on the western plains. The storekeeper returned the goods, saying they were not up to sample. The merchant disagreed, and having drawn a Sight Draft on the buyer, endeavored to collect through the local bank. The latter, however, returned the draft dishonored. An enquiry of the local postmaster as to the standing of the storekeeper brought the reply "O.K.," so the merchant promptly asked the postmaster to instruct the leading local lawyer to collect the bill. The reply was to the following effect: Sir,—The undersigned is the storekeeper on whom you attempted to foist your worthless merchandise, the undersigned is also the owner and president of the bank to which you sent your sight draft, the undersigned is the postmaster of this town, and also the lawyer whose services you sought to obtain. If the undersigned were not also the pastor of the local church he would tell you where to go.

China Awakened
By M. T. Z. TYAU
Illustrated. Cloth, 8vo.

Dr. Tyau is a Chinese publicist of distinction, who is now representing China in the League of Nations. He is introduced by Mr. Crane, the American Minister. He discusses China of today and the many changes that are taking place, the progress in elementary education, the beginnings of education for women, the development of the railways, the growth of mines and manufactures, the spread of journalism, the student movement, the organization of public opinion, and so forth.

It is as timely, comprehensive, forceful, and fair a book on China today as could be found. Dr. Tyau presents China's case in the Shantung difficulty, and does not deny the unfavorable side of Chinese affairs. He sets forth admirably the actual opportunities and prospects for an educational, industrial, and democratic revolution in China.

SYMPHONY ORGAN GOES ON STRIKE

Refuses to Stop When Rest of Players Are Done

A prolonged finale at the end of the second movement of Copeland's symphony, played last night at Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, furnished a feature never intended by the composer and introduced the large audience to a new angle of the modernistic.

UNEXPECTED FINALE

With its many strange harmonies, its unexpected intervals and its terrific outbursts of cacophony, evidenced in the first and second movements, it had already deeply impressed the gathering which was hearing it for the first time in this city. It was arranged for organ and orchestra

On the heels of what seemed the end of the movement came a strange dissonance with a high-pitched tone from the organ, at which Mademoiselle Nadia Boulanger, to whom the work was dedicated by Copland, was soloist.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, turned in his most dignified manner toward the right of the soloist, with a slight hint for cessation.

The high-pitched tone, never intended by Copeland, continued. Again Koussevitzky turned and hinted to the organist, but still the tone continued.

Director Richard Burgin stepped from his seat at Koussevitzky's left. There was a brief conference at the conductor's stand, there were a few gestures toward the organ, but still the tone went on.

Soloist Leaves Stage

Mademoiselle Boulanger took a hand and herself hinted and gestured toward Koussevitzky. She was plainly disturbed, finally leaving her post and going off the stage.

While director and conductor tried to maintain the highest attitude of dignity, the audience began to appreciate the situation. There was a soft but noticeable chatter, which ceased with expectancy when Mademoiselle Boulanger reappeared.

Stepping to the organ she touched the proper key and the finale became a finale in reality. The disonnance ceased.

It was one of those cases where the organ took matters into its own hands and refused to respond to the human touch. It balked.

Audience Applauds

Concealing his sigh of relief, Koussevitzky, all the time retaining his dignity, turned to his audience and with a graceful bow of reassurance, signalled the company for the third and final movement. There was a burst of applause and the incident was at an end.

Referring to their programmes, many of the audience found a significant reference to the symphony, which may have explained the attitude of the organ.

In his personal note, added by Copland to the programme of the symphony when it was originally produced, was the following: "The organ is treated as an integral part of the orchestra, rather than as a solo instrument with orchestral accompaniment; yet it always remains very much in the foreground."

On one or two occasions in the past the organ has acted strangely, but not to a degree of furnishing such a feature as on last night.

SUBJECT OF HUMAN RACE IS DEBATED

Darrow Pictures Man as Selfish; Nearing as Altruistic

Clarence S. Darrow, who was counsel for Loeb and Leopold, pessimistically portrayed man as arrogant, conceited, selfish and always minding someone else's business, while Professor Scott Nearing, socialogist, maintained the human race was altruistic, in a brilliant debate at Symphony Hall last night.

CONVULSE BIG AUDIENCE

Before 3000 people who filled every seat and jammed the side aisles, the pair took a subject as abstract as, "Is the Human Race Worth Working For," gave it life and convulsed the audience for two hours with their witty estimates of man.

Darrow proved his contention that he is a pessimist even though he did it optimistically. He flayed prohibitionists, Rotary Clubs, 100 per cent Americans, Puritans expressing general contempt for the puny arrogance of man and declared the only reason he defended a person in court was because he was made "in such a fool way" that it put him in the place of the man who suffered.

"Optimists Lack Sense of Humor"

"He says I am a pessimist," said Darrow, standing loosely beside the rostrum with his hands stuck in his pockets. "I am, especially when I meet optimists. You find them in the chambers of commerce. They are all optimists. They know life is worth while. You find them in the Rotary clubs singing fool songs and listening to worthless speeches. You find them in the Lions clubs. Hear them roar. You find them in the Kiwanis clubs. You find them wherever there are 100 per cent Americans, boasting, bragging and lying and stealing, solely interested in getting rich, and anything that may be used to get money.

"All optimists lack a sense of humor. If they didn't they would die laughing at themselves," said Darrow. The lines flowed out of his mouth. He attempted no oratory. Gestures were few. His attitude was that of a cross-examiner and not a platform speaker. And the more pessimistic he became the louder his audience—an audience of intellectuals, judges and leading lawyers of Boston—laughed.

Takes Fling at Prohibitionists

"I instinctively avoid people who are working for the public. Most people working for the public are working for themselves," he shouted, hitting Professor Nearing's argument that man tries to help his fellow-man.

"Take prohibitionists for instance. And religious fanatics. They know they are right and they want to make everyone else right. I have got nothing against them. I wouldn't try to reform them if they would leave me alone. But they are always trying to make the world perfect to their own image. Instead of telling men to live their lives, they are trying to tell you how to do it.

"I am satisfied that the world has not changed since I began to observe it. The average man of 1925 is not any kindlied or more considerate of his fello wman than the savage.

"Human Race Has Brought Ruin"

"All the Puritans of the world love the human race from John Calvin to Volstead. They are never satisfied with saving them unless they do something to them. For 500,000 years this human race has been on earth and it has brought desolation and ruin to it. It has made a shambles and graveyard of every living thing that good people may carry on their altruistic work."

Every habit, emotion of man or event in world history ran the gamut during the debate. Citing the fact that the Declaration of Independence was radical in its day, Mr. Darrow hit again at Rotary Clubs and Chambers of Commerce when he charged they handed out the Constitution of the United States to school children but never the Declaration of Independence.

No Decision Given

The debate was presided over by George A. Coleman, head of Ford Hall Forum. Because of the crowd of men and women who sat on the platform, little room was left for the speakers. It was a good-natured contest, without a decision. Both speakers laughed at the jibes of the other.

Professor Nearing, who held up the affirmative, was allowed 25 minutes for his main address, 30 minutes for rebuttal and 10 minutes more when Mr. Darrow concluded his rebuttal of 30 minutes. Mr. Darrow was given 35 minutes for his main speech.

Professor Nearing prefaced his address with a distinction between the selfishness of the man who works for himself and the man who wants to do something for others.

"If the human race is not worth working for, what is worth working for?" queried Professor Nearing. "What is the alternative to working for others? It is working for one's self and I would like to call Mr. Darrow's attention to the fact that in upholding the negative, he is in an uncomfortable position."

By working for others man established larger contracts with life or lived a greater life; every effort on the part of an individual for another raised the standard of living in the community. Every invention or discovery, he continued, that increased the joy of a human being, or increased his possibilities for social intercourse with his fellows could be counted as a net gain for the human race.

Makes Reference to Russia

Human nature, he regarded, he said, as an evolving entity constantly enlarging its possibilities. If man worked strictly for himself he would soon tire of it, he said; if he worked for a group the opportunities of the group are enhanced, thus proving human nature is worth working for, he declared.

Over in Russia, he continued, amid cheers at the mention of Russia, a system of collective service, to take the place of individualism was being worked up. He denied Darrow's allegation that man was not built for team work and answered by saying man possessed capabilities for team work if trained.

I wouldn't try to reform them if they would leave me alone. But they are always trying to make the world perfect to their own image. Instead of telling men to live their lives, they are trying to tell you how to do it.

"I am satisfied that the world has not changed since I began to observe it. The average man of 1925 is not any kindlied or more considerate of his fello wman than the savage.

"Human Race Has Brought Ruin"

"All the Puritans of the world love the human race from John Calvin to Volstead. They are never satisfied with saving them unless they do something to them. For 500,000 years this human race has been on earth and it has brought desolation and ruin to it. It has made a shambles and graveyard of every living thing that good people may carry on their altruistic work."

Every habit, emotion of man or event in world history ran the gamut during the debate. Citing the fact that the Declaration of Independence was radical in its day, Mr. Darrow hit again at Rotary Clubs and Chambers of Commerce when he charged they handed out the Constitution of the United States to school children but never the Declaration of Independence.

No Decision Given

The debate was presided over by George A. Coleman, head of Ford Hall Forum. Because of the crowd of men and women who sat on the platform, little room was left for the speakers. It was a good-natured contest, without a decision. Both speakers laughed at the jibes of the other.

Professor Nearing, who held up the affirmative, was allowed 25 minutes for his main address, 30 minutes for rebuttal and 10 minutes more when Mr. Darrow concluded his rebuttal of 30 minutes. Mr. Darrow was given 35 minutes for his main speech.

Professor Nearing prefaced his address with a distinction between the selfishness of the man who works for himself and the man who wants to do something for others.

"If the human race is not worth working for, what is worth working for?" queried Professor Nearing. "What is the alternative to working for others? It is working for one's self and I would like to call Mr. Darrow's attention to the fact that in upholding the negative, he is in an uncomfortable position."

By working for others man established larger contracts with life or lived a greater life; every effort on the part of an individual for another raised the standard of living in the community. Every invention or discovery, he continued, that increased the joy of a human being, or increased his possibilities for social intercourse with his fellows could be counted as a net gain for the human race.

Makes Reference to Russia

Human nature, he regarded, he said, as an evolving entity constantly enlarging its possibilities. If man worked strictly for himself he would soon tire of it, he said; if he worked for a group the opportunities of the group are enhanced, thus proving human nature is worth working for, he declared.

Over in Russia, he continued, amid cheers at the mention of Russia, a system of collective service, to take the place of individualism was being worked up. He denied Darrow's allegation that man was not built for team work and answered by saying man possessed capabilities for team work if trained.

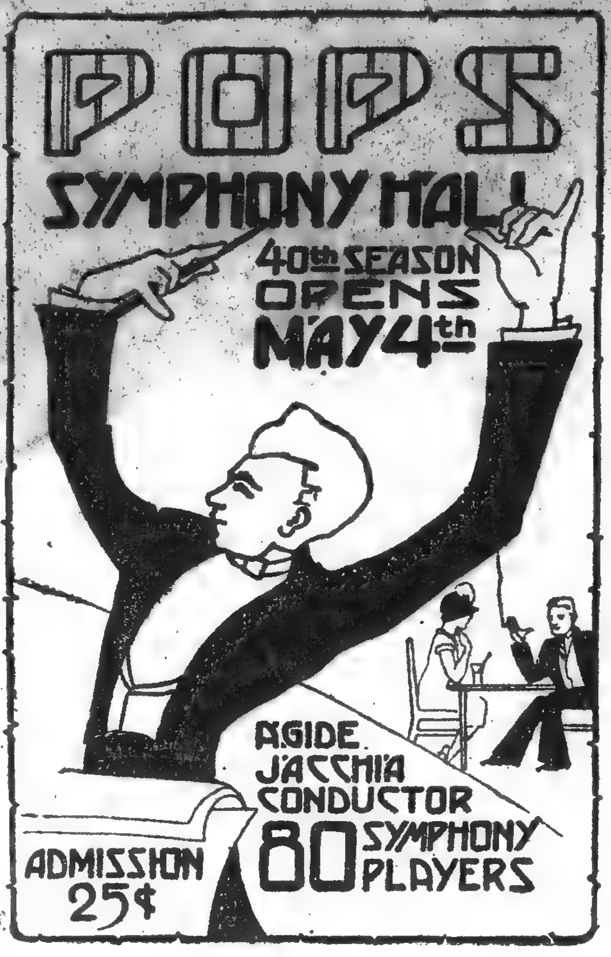
phony Concert to Aid Pen



This is the prize-winning poster design which is soon to make its appearance all over the city, advertising the Pops concerts. It was devised by a Waltham girl, Miss Doris Dennen, of the Museum School, in collaboration with Mr. McFadden of the same school.

Miss Doris Dennen, student at the Museum School of Fine Arts, and living at 488 Lexington street, Waltham, whose design, executed in collaboration with Mr. McFadden of the same school, has been accepted for the official poster to advertise this season's pop concerts.

Beatrice Noyes Boasts About Her Son--Meakins a Doc--Stage Gossip

Victor Morley, now appearing with becoming grace in "Is Zat So?" whom the once-upon-a-timers will remember best for his long service in musical comedy harness, has a very poor opinion of the present musical comedy production. And of the three, Johnny suffered most. He knew the house rules and he recognized fair competition with "What Price Glory," in the Keenan vehicle. He, however, lacked sufficient Napoleonic qualities to cancel a head-liner. So he wired New York as follows:

"Headline act full of profanity. If B. F. Keith heard it, he would turn over in his grave. What shall I do?"

Less than two hours later the Cleveland manager received the following telegram from the booking office:

"You manage the theatre. We'll take care of the dead."

Roland Hayes Tells Own Story

Once Lived in the Hub in Tiny Flat, Now Earns $100,000 a Year

Born in poverty, the son of former slaves—

But now a world-famous concert tenor.

Once living in Boston with his mother in a four-dollar-and-fifty-cents-a-week flat, supplied with crude furniture he made himself from packing boxes—

But now earning $100,000 a year with his singing.

That is the astounding career of Roland Hayes.

In his own words, as published in the American Magazine for June, he tells the amazing story in the excerpts below.

Don't imagine that Roland Hayes' enormous audiences are drawn merely by curiosity. The best critics in the world have praised him with almost extravagant enthusiasm.

As one of them wrote in a New York paper: "It does not matter particularly whether Roland Hayes is black, or white, or green! What does matter is that he is an artist, and a great one."

But in the beginning, every sort of discouraging obstacle confronted him.

Feet Scarred With Molten Iron

"My father died when I was 12 years old," Hayes told the interviewer, "My mother had no high ambitions for us, except that we should become good men and women, industrious and self-supporting. She hated to see us growing up in ignorance.

"While we were waiting for school to open (this was in Chattanooga, where the mother had moved the family from its original isolated home, to be near a school) I found a job in a factory that made window weights. It was the hardest work I have ever done! I had to unload pig iron, handle the rough scrap iron, help charge the cupolas with wood, coke and iron and, with another man, carry the heavy ladles, brimming with melted iron, to pour into moulds, to make the window weights and other castings.

"I wore old shoes with no laces in them, so that they could be kicked off easily when the hot iron would spill. My feet are peppered now with scars where the hot flakes of iron fell on them.

"At first I was paid 80 cents a day—and we lived on that. But after a while my wages were raised to $1 a day—every cent of which I gave my mother—and I was promoted to the position of core maker in the sash weight factory. This wage continued through the remainder of my brother's first year in school. I gave it up when it came my time to go to school. After the period of my first school term I went back to the foundry, and worked all the summer to the autumn, when I was made foreman over the core department.

"I Was Born Again!"

"When the time came for my second school year I said that I would not go back. We needed the money I earned. I would keep my job, and study at night with a colored teacher who had agreed to give me lessons. Mother consented to this, the more readily because when I was made foreman of the core department at the factory my wages became $3 a day.

"Meanwhile I had joined a little colored church and was singing in the choir.

"Long afterward, the white man who was foreman over the sash weight foundry, told me that I kept the shop going—simply by my singing. He would not let the other men sing. But he never stopped me.

"When I was 17 years old I met Arthur Calhoun, a young Negro who had been studying music at Oberlin. He was teaching in Chattanooga; and in order to earn a little extra he gave entertainments in the church I attended.

"The choir assisted him; and one night we gave an anthem in which I had a little solo. Nevertheless, when my new friend tried to persuade me to train my voice I wouldn't take him seriously. He was so persistent, however, that I consented to let him teach me, or try to, and for a while he gave me lessons. But still I wasn't very much interested.

"Then, one night," Hayes said, in a low voice that thrilled with feeling, "I had a sudden and startling revelation; it happened in this way: Arthur Calhoun had told a white gentleman, living in Chattanooga, about me; and this man had kindly suggested that I come to his house some evening and sing for him.

"Of course, we being negroes the lady of the house and her daughters, immediately left the room. But after I had sung a little while they were good enough to come back, one by one.

"I felt very shy, rather overcome with awe of my surroundings. It was not a mansion; but I never before had been in any but the homes of poor colored people; so it seemed very grand to me.

"When I had finished singing, the gentleman asked me if I had heard any of the great musicians. Of course I hadn't. I didn't even know about them! So he played some records on his gramaphone, and I listened to Caruso and Sembrich and Eames, and others of the world's famous singers."

Leaning forward, and speaking with "That night I was born again!"

Good Luck From Boston

After three months' meditation and after gaining his mother's consent, he entered Fiske University at Nashville, where he worked his way for four years. Then:

"I went to Louisville and got work as a waiter in the Pendennis Club, to which many of the prominent men of the city belonged. They often gave large dinners, at which there would be some sort of entertainment; and one night the head waiter allowed me to sing at one of these dinners.

"Apparently I pleased them," he said, with a little smile, "for they dispensed with the rest of the programme and kept me singing all the time.

"After that, I often had the chance to earn extra money in this way. Usually I was paid $5. And sometimes a man would come to me personally and slip another dollar or two into my hand. So I was able to save quite a little sum.

"One night I sang at a dinner given to a gathering of men from the North; and among them was Mr. Henry H. Putnam, of Boston. Afterward, he told the gentleman who had arranged the dinner said that I ought to be in Boston, where my voice could be trained.

"He did not speak to me, however; and the other gentleman did not tell me of the incident. So I did not even know that Mr. Putnam had been there.

"Then, only a little later, I received a letter from the president of Fisk. He wrote that there was to be a great convention, called 'The World in Boston'; that a group of Fisk singers was to be sent up there, to furnish a daily programme at the meetings; and he asked if I would go with them. Our expenses would be paid, and I would receive at the rate of $50 a month for the six weeks of my stay.

"This was the very opportunity I wanted. I happened—no! not happened! I was meant to speak of it to the very man to whom Mr. Putnam had mentioned his interest in me. And he immediately gave me a letter of introduction to Mr. Putnam.

"On my way to Boston, I stopped at Chattanooga and had a half-hour with my mother. She still was unreconciled to my substituting music for a good job in a factory," he said smilingly; "but she no longer tried to dissuade me.

"In Boston I went to see Mr. Putnam, to whose interest I owe more than I can express. He persuaded four of the leading vocal teachers in the city to try my voice. One by one, I went to them, sang, was told I had a 'very nice voice'—and that was all.

"But after several days of suspense and discouragement, I was told that I might take my choice of these teachers! I could have free instruction at the New England Conservatory, or I could go to a teacher whom I must pay. I chose to do the latter, and became a pupil of Mr. Arthur Hubbard, a man with a heart of gold.

"I did all this, and arranged to get work, before I said a word to any of my companions from Fisk.

"At first I was a bellhop at the Brunswick Hotel. Then, after I left there, Mr. D. W. Sutherland, of the Hancock Life Insurance Company, heard me sing at the Boston City Club, became interested in me and gave me a job in his office as messenger, at seven dollars a week. I remained in the employ of the company almost four years.

"Our Bare Little Rooms"

'Not long after I began my studies with Mr. Hubbard, my elder brother married and went to California. He had been the only one of my mother's children who had left home. Now she was alone—and that thought was intolerable to me. I told Mr. Hubbard about it, and said I was going to bring my mother to Boston. But as my expenses would be greater I should have to give up my lessons. He offered to lend me money. I asked him, instead, to continue my lessons—but to give me time to pay for them. This he was very willing to do.

"I went to Chattanooga, sold my mother's belongings—except such things as bed linen, which we packed in a large box—and we returned to Boston, where we boarded in the home where I had been living.

"But my mother was very lonely, away from her friends. And she missed having her own home to look after. So I rented a cheap little flat for $4.50 a week—which left $2.50 on which we must live. I still had a little of my savings left; but oh, so very little! I bought a cook-stove, for we had to have that. But it was the only piece of real 'furniture' we did have.

It was in 1911 that Hayes went to Boston; and for eight years he studied, worked, struggled. As time went on, he had opportunities to earn a little—$15 or $25—by singing in churches in Boston, or other New England towns. But he and his mother were always hard pressed to make both ends meet and to add a little to the money he was trying to save.

Failure—and Hope

He was putting this money by for a special purpose. He wanted to give some recitals; and he knew that probably, for a time at least, he would lose money on them. Finally he made the attempt—and lost 700 precious dollars! Nothing daunted, he gave another concert. And this time he made $500. So he almost "broke even" on the two.

"Then," he told me, "I dared to do something which everyone assured me was pure madness. I engaged Symphony Hall! I had no financial backing; but I had some very kind friends. Mr. Hubbard, when he found I would not give up, did everything he could to help me.

"Not with money!" he added quickly. "I did not want, and I never have received, a single dollar of financial backing.

"But I did go to friends and ask them for their influence and to give me the names of people who might be willing to come to my concert. Then I studied the 'phone directory; and when I came to a name I liked I added it to my list."

When Hayes noticed my smile at this rather eccentric method of finding possible patrons, he said:

"To me, names have great individuality. Very often a name suggests its owners personality. I have a decided reaction to names; and with this as a guide I made out my list.

"However, inside of two weeks, so many people—less timid, or less bigoted, than these—had taken tickets, that I had my eight hundred dollars to pay for Symphony Hall and other expenses. The night of the concert the auditorium was crowded to the doors, and seven hundred persons were turned away. I cleared two thousand dollars from that concert."

"What did your mother say to that?" I asked.

"She said, 'It's very wonderful. But—remember who you are!'"

42d Season BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA 1922-23

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

Dear Sir or Madam:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of twenty-four Friday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston, beginning October 13, 1922.

The prices of season tickets will be the same as last year.

Distinguished soloists will appear at these concerts.

Please advise me, by the enclosed card, not later than May 1, whether or not you wish to renew your subscription for the seats you now hold. Payment may be made by remittance to Symphony Hall, Boston, at any time before September 1, 1922.

A prompt reply will be much appreciated.

Yours very truly,

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager.

Symphony Hall, Boston,
April 8, 1922.

Please note that the option to renew the subscription for your former seats expires May 1, after which date seats not subscribed for will be placed on public sale.

Richard Aldrich, N. Y. Times (Jan. 7):
"Josef Hofmann appeared for the second time this season at Carnegie Hall before such an audience as he always plays for in New York, one that filled every seat in the hall, and that was raised to the highest pitch of imagination. Such piano playing has only most rarely been heard in New York; or say, never."
W. J. Henderson, N. Y. Herald:
"The writer makes no hesitation in declaring that yesterday afternoon he heard the greatest piano recital within his recollection."
